

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

About Google Book Search

Google's mission is to organize the world's information and to make it universally accessible and useful. Google Book Search helps readers discover the world's books while helping authors and publishers reach new audiences. You can search through the full text of this book on the web at <http://books.google.com/>

NYPL RESEARCH LIBRARIES

3 3433 07493721 4

GANSEVOORT-LANSING
COLLECTION

given to the New York Public Library Astor Lenox and Tilden Foundations

BY VICTOR HUGO PALTSITS

under the terms of the last will and testament of

CATHERINE GANSEVOORT LANSING

granddaughter of General Peter Gansevoort, junior and widow of the Honorable Abraham Lansing of Albany, New York

NOV

DECEMBER 19

THE WONDROUS TALE OF ALROY.

THE RISE OF ISKANDER.

BY THE AUTHOR OF
VIVIAN GREY, CONTARINI FLEMING, &c.

IN TWO VOLUMES.
VOL. II.

PHILADELPHIA :
CAREY, LEA AND BLANCHARD.

1833.

U.S.

GANSEVOORT - LANSING COLLECTION

Philadelphia :
Printed by James Kay, Jun. & Co.
Race above 4th Street.

THE

WONDROUS TALE OF ALROY.

THE WONDROUS TALE OF ALROY.

PART VIII.

VI.

“ I must see the king !”

“ Holy priest, his highness has retired. It is impossible.”

“ I must see the king. Worthy Pharez, I take all peril on myself.”

“ Indeed his highness’s orders are imperative. You cannot see him.”

“ Knowest thou who I am ?”

“ One whom all pious Hebrews reverence.”

“ I say I must see the king.”

“ Indeed, indeed, holy Jabaster, it cannot be.”

“ Shall Israel perish for a menial’s place ? Go to ; I’ll see him.”

“ Nay ! if you will. I’ll struggle for my duty.”

“ Touch not the Lord’s anointed. Dog, you shall suffer for this !”

So saying, Jabaster threw aside Pharez, and, with the attendant clinging to his robes, rushed into the royal chamber.

“What is all this,” exclaimed Alroy, starting from the divan. “Jabaster! Pharez, withdraw! How now, is Bagdad in insurrection.

“Worse, much worse, Israel soon will be.”

“Ay!”

“My fatal brother has told me all, nor would I sleep until I lifted up my voice to save thee.”

“Am I in danger?”

“In the wilderness, when the broad desert quivered beneath thy trembling feet, and the dark heavens poured down their burning torrents, thou wert less so. In that hour of death, one guarded thee, who ne'er forgets his fond and faithful offspring, and now, when he has brought thee out of the house of bondage; now, when thy fortunes, like a noble cedar, swell in the air, and shadow all the land, thou, the very leader of his people, his chosen one, for whom he hath worked such marvels—thy heart is turned from thy father's God, and hankers after strange abominations.”

Through the broad arch that led into the gardens of the serail, the moonlight fell upon the tall figure, and the upraised arm of the priest; Alroy stood with folded arms at some distance, watching Jabaster as he spoke, with a calm, but searching glance. Suddenly he advanced with a quick step, and, placing his hand upon Jabaster's arm, said in a low, inquiring tone, “You are speaking of this marriage?”

“Of that which ruined Solomon.”

“Listen to me, Jabaster,” said Alroy, interrupting him, in a calm, but peremptory tone. “I cannot forget that I am speaking to my master, as well as to my friend. The Lord, who knoweth all things, hath deemed me worthy of his mission.

My fitness for this high and holy office was not admitted without proof. A lineage, which none else could offer, mystic studies, shared by few, a mind that dared encounter all things, and a frame that could endure most,—these were my claims;—but no more of this. I have passed the great ordeal, the Lord of Hosts hath found me not unworthy of his charge; I have established his people, his altars blaze with sacrifices, his priests are honoured—bear witness thou, Jabaster—his omnipotent unity is declared. What wouldst thou more ?”

“ All !”

“ Then Moses knew ye well. It is a stiff-necked people.”

“ Sire, bear with me. If I speak in heat, I speak in zeal. You ask me what I wish: my answer is, a national existence, which we have not. You ask me what I wish: my answer is, the Land of Promise. You ask me what I wish: my answer is, Jerusalem. You ask me what I wish: my answer is, the temple—all we have forfeited, all we have yearned after, all for which we have fought—our beautiful country, our holy creed, our simple manners, and our ancient customs.”

“ Manners change with time and circumstances; customs may be observed every where. The ephod on thy breast proves our faith; and for a country, is the Tigris less than Siloah, or the Euphrates inferior to the Jordan ?”

“ Alas ! alas ! there was a glorious prime when Israel stood aloof from other nations, a fair and holy thing that God had hallowed. We were then a chosen family, a most peculiar people, set apart for God’s entire enjoyment. All about us was solemn, deep and holy. We shunned the stranger as an unclean thing that must defile our solitary sanctity, and keeping to ourselves, and to our God, our lives flowed on in one great solemn tide of deep religion, making the meanest of our multitude feel greater than the kings of other lands. It was a glorious time: I thought it had returned—but I awake from this, as other dreams.”

“ We must leave off dreaming, good Jabaster,— we must act. Were I, by any chance, to fall into one of those reveries, with which I have often lost the golden hours at Hamadan, or in our old cave, I should hear, some fine morning, his sultanship of Roum rattling at my gates.” Alroy smiled as he spoke: he would willingly have introduced a lighter tone into the dialogue, but the solemn countenance of the priest was not sympathetic with his levity.

“ My heart is full, and yet I cannot speak: the memory of the past o'erpowers my thought. I had vainly deemed my voice, inspired by the soul of truth, might yet preserve him ; and now I stand here in his presence, silent and trembling, like a guilty thing. Oh, my prince! my pupil!” said the priest, advancing, falling on his knee, and seizing the robe of Alroy, “ by thy sacred lineage, by the sweet memory of thy ardent youth, and our united studies—by all thy zealous thoughts, and solemn musings, and glorious aspirations after fame—by all thy sufferings, and by all thy triumph, and chiefly by the name of that great God, who hath elected thee his favoured child—by all the marvels of thy mighty mission,—I do adjure thee! Arise, Alroy, arise and rouse thyself. The lure that snared thy fathers may trap thee—this Dalilah may shear thy mystic lock. Spirits like thee act not by halves. Once fall out from the straight course before thee, and though thou deemest 'tis but to saunter mid the summer trees, soon thou wilt find thyself in the dark depths of some infernal forest, where none may rescue thee!”

“What if I do inherit the eager blood of my great ancestor, at least I hold his sceptre. Shall aught of earthly power prevail against the supernatural sway of Heaven and Hades?”

“Sire, sire, the legend that came from Sinai is full of high instruction. But shape thy conduct by its oracles, and all were well. It says our people only can be established by him who rules them with the virge of Solomon. Sire, when the Lord offered his pleasure to that mighty king, thou knowest his deep discretion. Riches, and length of days, empire and vengeance—these were not the choice of one to whom all accidents were proffered. The legend bears an inward spirit, as well as outward meaning. The capture of the prize was a wise test of thy imperial fitness. Thou hast his sceptre, but without his wisdom—’tis but a staff of cedar.”

“Hah! Art thou there? I am glad to see Jabaster politic. Hear me, my friend. What my feelings be unto this royal lady, but little matters. Let them pass, and let us view this question by the light wherein you have placed it, the flame of policy and not of passion. I am no traitor to the God of Israel, in whose name I have conquered, and in whose name I shall rule; but thou art a learned doctor, thou canst inform us. I have heard no mandate to yield my glorious empire for my meanest province. I am lord of Asia, so would I have my long posterity. Our people are but a remnant, a feeble fraction of the teeming millions that own my sway. What I hold I can defend; but my children may not inherit the spirit of their sire. The Moslemin will recognize their rule with readier hearts, when they remember a daughter of their caliphs gave them life. You see I too am politic, my good Jabaster?”

“The policy of the son of Kareah—’t was fatal. He preferred Egypt to Judah, and he suffered. Sire, the Lord hath blessed Judah : it is his land. He would have it filled by his peculiar people, so that his worship might ever flourish. For this he has, by many curious rites and customs, marked us out from all other nations, so that we cannot, at the same time, mingle with them and yet be true to him. We must exist alone. To preserve that loneliness, is the great end and essence of our law. What have we to do with Bagdad, or its people, where every instant we must witness some violation of our statutes ? Can we pray with them ? Can we eat with them ? In the highest duties, and the lowest occupations of existence, alike we cannot mingle. From the altar of our God, to our own domestic boards, we are alike separated from them. Sire, you may be king of Bagdad, but you cannot, at the same time, be a Jew.”

“I am what I am. I worship the Lord of Hosts. Perhaps, in his mercy, he will accept the days of Nishabur and the Tigris, as a compensation for some slight relaxation in the ritual of the baker and the bath.”

“And mark my words : it was by the ritual of the baker and the bath, that Alroy rose, and without it he will fall. The genius of the people raised him, which he shared, and that genius has been formed by the law of Moses. Based on that law, he might indeed have handed down an empire to his long posterity ; and now, though the tree of his fortunes seems springing up by the water side, fed by a thousand springs, and its branches covered with dew, there is a gangrene in the sap, and to-morrow he may sink like a shrivelled gourd. Alas ! alas ! for Israel ! We have long fed on mallows ; but to lose the vintage in the very day of fruition, ’t is very bitter. Ah ! when I raised thy exhausted form in the cavern of Gentesma, and the star of David beamed brightly in the glowing heavens upon thy high fulfilment, who could have dreamed of a night like this ? Farewell sire."

"Stop, Jabaster ! earliest, dearest friend, pr'ythee, pr'ythee stop !"

The priest slowly turned, the prince hesitated.

"Part not in anger, good Jabaster."

"In sorrow, sire, only in sorrow ; but deep and terrible."

"Israel is lord of Asia, my Jabaster. Why should we fear ?"

"Solomon built Tadmor in the wilderness, and his fleet brought gold from Ophir ; and yet Alroy was born a slave."

"But did not die one. The sultans of the world have fallen before me. I have no fear. Nay, do not go. At least you 'll place some credence in the stars, my learned cabalist. See, my planet shines as brightly as my fortunes." Alroy withdrew the curtain, himself and Jabaster stepped on to the terrace. A beautiful star glittered on high. As they gazed, its colour changed, and a blood-red meteor burst from its circle, and fell into space. The conqueror and the priest looked at each other at the same time. Their countenances were pale, inquiring and agitated.

"Sire," said Jabaster "march to Judah."

"It portends war," replied Alroy, endeavouring to recover himself. "Perchance some troubles in Persia."

"Troubles at home, no other. The danger is nigh. Look to thyself."

A wild scream was heard in the gardens. It sounded thrice.

"What is all this ?" exclaimed Alroy, really agitated. "Rouse the guard, Jabaster, search the gardens."

"'Tis useless, and may do harm. It was a spirit that shrieked."

"What said it?"

"MENE, MENE, TEKEL, UPHARSIN!"

VII.

"The old story, the priest against the king," said Honain to Alroy, when, at his morrow's interview, he had listened to the events of the preceding night. "My pious brother wishes to lead you back to the theocracy, and is fearful that if he pray at Bagdad, instead of Sion, he may chance to become only the head of an inferior sect, instead of revelling in the universal tithes of a whole nation. As for the meteor, Scherirah must have crossed the river about the same time, and the sultan of Roum may explain the bloody portent. For the shriek, as I really have no acquaintance with spirits, I must leave the miraculous communication to the favoured ears and initiated intelligences of your highness and my brother. It seems, it differed from 'the daughter of the Voice' in more respects than one, since it was not only extremely noisy, but, as it would appear, quite unintelligible, except to the individual who had an interest in the interpretation—an ingenious one, I confess. When I enter upon my functions as your highness's chamberlain, I will at least guarantee that your slumbers shall not be disturbed either by spirits or more unwelcome visitors."

"Enter upon them at once, good Honain.

How fares my Persian rose to day, my sweet Schirene?"

"Feeding on your image in your absence. She spares no word to me, I do assure your highness."

"Nay, nay, we know you are a general favourite with the sex, Honain. I' faith I'm jealous."

"I would your highness had cause," said Honain, very demurely.

VIII.

The approaching marriage between the king of the Hebrews and the princess of Bagdad was published throughout Asia. Preparations were made on the plain of the Tigris for the great rejoicing. Whole forests were felled to provide materials for the building and fuel for the banquetting. All the governors of provinces and cities, all the chief officers and nobility of both nations, were specially invited, and daily arrived in state at Bagdad. Among them the viceroy of the Medes and Persians, and his recent bride, the princess Miriam, were conspicuous, followed by a train of nearly ten thousand persons.

A throne, ascended by one hundred steps covered with crimson cloth, and crowned by a golden canopy, was raised in the middle of the plain: on each side two thrones less elevated, but equally gorgeous. In the front of these thrones an immense circus was described, formed by one hundred chartaks or amphitheatres, ample room for the admittance of the multitude being left between the buildings. These chartaks were covered with bright brocades and showy carpets, on each was hoisted a bright and brilliant banner. In some of them were bands of choice musicians, in others companies of jugglers, buffoons, and storiers. Five chartaks on each side of the thrones were allotted for the convenience of the court, the rest were filled by the different trades of the city. In one the fruiterers had formed a beautiful garden, glowing with pomegranates, and gourds, and water-melons, oranges, almonds and pistachio nuts;—in another the butchers exhibited their meats carved in the most fanciful shapes, and the skins of animals dressed up in very ludicrous figures. Here assembled the furriers, all dressed in masquerade, like leopards, lions, tigers and foxes, and in another booth mustered the upholsterers, proud of a camel made of wood, and reeds, and cord, and painted linen, a camel which walked about as if alive, though ever and anon the interior man drawing aside a curtain, discovered to the marvelling multitude the workman in his own piece. Further on might be perceived the cotton manufacturers, whose chartak was full of birds of all shapes and plumage, yet nevertheless formed of their curious plant, and of the same material, with the help of reeds, although every one imagined it to be built with bricks and mortar, rose in the centre a lofty minaret. It was covered with embroidered work, and on the top was placed a stork so cunningly devised, that the children pelted it with pistachio nuts. The saddlers showed their skill in two litters, open at top, each carried on a dromedary, and in each a beautiful woman, who diverted the spectators with light balls of gilt leather, throwing them up both with their hands and feet. Nor were the mat-makers backwark in the proof of their dexterity, since instead of a common banner, they exhibited a large standard of reeds worked with two lines of writing in Kufic, proclaiming the happy names of Alroy and Schirene. But indeed in every chartak might be witnessed some wondrous specimens of the wealth of Bagdad, and of the ingenuity of its unrivalled artisans.

Around this mighty circus, on every side, for the space of many miles, the plain was studded with innumerable pavilions. At measured intervals were tables furnished with every species of provision, and attended by appointed servants, flagons of wine and jars of sherbets mingled with infinite baskets of delicious fruits and trays of refreshing confectionary. Although open to all comers, so great and rapid was the supply, that these banquetting tables seemed ever laden, and that the joys of the people might be complete, they were allowed to pursue whatever pleasures they thought fit without any restraint, by proclamation, in these terms.

“ This is the time of feasting, pleasure and rejoicing. Let no person reprimand or complain of another : let not the rich insult the poor, or the strong the weak : let no one ask another, ‘ why have you done this ? ’ ”

Millions of people were collected in this paradise. They rejoiced, they feasted, they frolicked, they danced, they sang. They listened to the tales of the Arabian storièr, at once enchanted and enchanting, or melted to the strain of the Persian poet, as he painted the moon-lit forehead of his heroine, and the wasting and shadowy form of his love sick hero: they beheld with amazement the feats of the juggler of the Ganges, or giggled at the practised wit and the practical buffoonery of the Syrian mime. And the most delighted could still spare a fascinated glance to the inviting gestures and the voluptuous grace of the dancing girls of Egypt. Everywhere were melody and merriment, rarity and beauty. For once mankind forgot their cares, and delivered themselves up to infinite enjoyment.

"I grow courteous," said Kislock the Kourid, assisting a party into one of the shows.

"And I humane," said Calidas the Indian. "Fellow, how dare you violate the proclamation, by thrashing that child?" He turned to one of the stewards of the tables who was belabouring the unfortunate driver of a camel which had stumbled, and in its fall, had shivered its burthen, two panniers of porcelain.

"Mind your own business, fellow," replied the steward, "and be thankful that for once in your life you can dine."

"Is this the way to speak to an officer," said Calidas the Indian; "I have half a mind to cut your tongue out."

"Never mind, little fellow," said the Guebre, "here is a dirhem for you. Run away and be merry."

"A miracle," grinned the Negro, "he giveth alms."

"And you are witty," rejoined the Guebre. "'Tis a wondrous day."

"What shall we do," said Kisloch.

"Let us dine," proposed the Negro.

"Ay! under this plane-tree," said Calidas, "'Tis pleasant to be alone. I hate every body but ourselves."

"Here, stop, you rascal," said the Guebre. "What's your name?"

"I am a Hadgee," said our old friend Abdallah, the servant of the charitable merchant Ali, and who was this day one of the officiating stewards.

"Are you a Jew, you scoundrel?" said the Guebre, "that is the only thing worth being. Bring some wine, you accursed giaour!"

"Instantly," said Kisloch, "and a pilau."

“And a gazelle stuffed with almonds,” said Calidas.

“And some sugar-plums,” said the Negro.

“Quick, you infernal Gentile, or I’ll send this javelin in your back,” halloed the Guebre.

The servile Abdallah hastened away, and soon bustled back, carrying two flagons of wine, and followed by four servants, each with a tray covered with dainties.

“Where are you going, you accursed scoundrels,” grumbled Kisloch, “wait upon the true believers.”

“We shall be more free alone,” whispered Calidas.

“Away, then, dogs,” growled Kisloch.

Abdallah and his attendants hurried off, but were soon summoned back.

“Why did not you bring Schiraz wine?” asked Calidas, with an eye of fire.

“The pilau is overdone,” thundered Kisloch.

“You have brought a lamb stuffed with pistachio nuts, instead of a gazelle with almonds,” said the Guebre.

“Not half sugar-plums enough,” said the Negro.

“Every thing is wrong,” said Kisloch. “Go, and get us a kabob”(1).

In time, however, even this unmanageable crew were satisfied, and seated under their plane-tree, and stuffing themselves with all the dainties of the East, they became more amiable as their appetites decreased.

“A bumper, Calidas, and a song,” said Kisloch.

“’Tis rare stuff,” said the Guebre, “come, cally, it should inspire you.”

“Here goes, then ; mind the chorus.”

THE SONG OF CALIDAS.

Drink, drink, deeply drink,
Never feel, and never think,
What 's love? what 's fame? a sigh, a smile,
Friendship, but a hollow wile.
If you've any thought or wo,
Drown them in the goblet's flow.
Yes! dash them in this brimming cup,
Dash them in, and drink them up.
Drink, drink, deeply drink,
Never feel, and never think.

“Hark, the trumpets! The king and queen!
The procession is coming. Let 's away.”

“Again! they must be near. Hurry, hurry, for good places.”

“Break all the cups and dishes. Come along!”

The multitude from all quarters hurried to the great circus amid the clash of ten thousand cymbals, and the blast of innumerable trumpets. In the distance, issuing from the gates of Bagdad, might be detected a brilliant crowd, the advance company of the bridal procession.

There came five hundred maidens crowned with flowers, and beauteous as the buds that girt their hair. Their flowing robes were whiter than the swan, and each within her hand a palm branch held.

Followed these a band of bright musicians, clothed in golden robes, and sounding silver trumpets.

Then five hundred youths, brilliant as stars, clad in jackets of white fox-skin, and alternately bearing baskets of fruit or flowers.

Followed these a band of bright musicians, clothed in silver robes, and sounding golden trumpets.

Six choice steeds, sumptuously caparisoned, each led by an Arab groom(2).

The household of Medad, in robes of crimson, lined with sable.

The standard of Medad.

Medad, on a coal-black Arab, followed by three hundred officers of his division, all mounted on steeds of a pure race.

Slaves, bearing the bridal present of Medad, six Damascus sabres of unrivalled temper(3).

Twelve choice steeds, sumptuously caparisoned, each led by an Anatolian groom.

The household of Ithamar, in robes of violet, lined with ermine.

The standard of Ithamar.

Ithamar, on a snow-white Anatolian charger(4), followed by six hundred officers of his division, all mounted on steeds of a pure race.

Slaves bearing the marriage present of Ithamar. A golden vase of rubies, borne on a violet throne.

One hundred negroes, their noses bored, and hung with rings of brilliants, playing upon wind instruments and kettle-drums.

The standard of the city of Bagdad.

The deputation from the citizens of Bagdad.

Two hundred mules with caparisons of satin, embroidered with gold, and adorned with small golden bells. These bore the sumptuous wardrobe, presented by the city to their princess. Each mule was attended by a girl, dressed like a Peri, with starry wings, and a man, masqued as a hideous Dive.

The standard of Egypt.

The deputation from the Hebrews of Egypt, mounted on dromedaries, with silver furniture.

Fifty slaves, bearing their present to the princess, with golden cords, a mighty bath of jasper, beautifully carved, the sarcophagus of some ancient temple, and purchased for an immense sum.

The standard of Syria.

The deputation from the Hebrews of the Holy Land, headed by Rabbi Zimri himself, each carrying in his hand his offering to the nuptial pair, a precious vase, containing earth from the mount of Sion.

The standard of Hamadan.

The deputation from the citizens of Hamadan, headed by the venerable Bostenay himself, whose sumptuous charger was led by Caleb.

The present of the city of Hamadan to David Alroy, offered, at his own suggestion, the cup in which the prince of the captivity carried his tribute, now borne full of sand.

Fifty choice steeds, sumptuously caparisoned, each led by a Median or Persian groom.

The household of Abner and Miriam, in number twelve hundred, clad in chain armour of ivory and gold.

The standard of the Medes and Persians.

Two white elephants, with golden litters, bearing the viceroy and his princess.

The offering of Abner to Alroy, twelve elephants of state, with furniture embroidered with jewels, each tended by an Indian clad in chain armour of ivory and gold.

The offering of Miriam to Schirene. Fifty plants of roses from Rocnabad(5), a white shawl of Kashmere fifty feet in length, which folded into the handle of a fan; fifty screens each made of a feather of the roc(6); and fifty vases of crystal full of exquisite perfumes, and each sealed with a talisman of precious stones.

After these followed the eunuch guard.

Then came the band of the Serail, consisting of three hundred dwarfs, hideous indeed to behold, but the most complete musicians in the world.

The steeds of Solomon, in number one hundred, each with a natural star upon its front, uncaparisoned, and led only by a bridle of diamonds.

The household of Alroy and Schirene. Foremost, the Lord Honain riding upon a chesnut charger shod with silver; the dress of the rider pink with silver stars. From his rosy turban depended a tremulous aigrette of brilliants(7), blazing, with a thousand shifting tints.

Two hundred pages followed him; and then servants of both sexes, gorgeously habited, amounting to nearly two thousand, carrying rich vases, magnificent caskets, and costly robes. The treasurer and two hundred of his underlings came after, showering golden dirhems on all sides.

The sceptre of Solomon, borne by Asriel himself.

A magnificent and lofty car, formed of blue enamel with golden wheels, and axletrees of turquoises and brilliants, and drawn by twelve snow-white and sacred horses, four abreast; in the car, Alroy and Schirene.

Five thousand of the sacred guard closed the procession.

Amid the exclamations of the people, this gorgeous procession crossed the plain, and moved around the mighty circus. The conqueror and his bride ascended their throne; its steps were covered by the youths and maidens. On the throne, upon their right, sat the venerable Bostenay; on the left, the gallant viceroy and his princess. The chartaks on each side were crowded with the court.

The deputations made their offerings, the chiefs and captains paid their homage, the trades of the city moved before the throne in order, and exhibited their various ingenuity. Thrice was the proclamation made, amid the sound of trumpets, and then began the games.

A thousand horsemen dashed into the arena and threw the jerreed. They galloped at full speed, they arrested their fiery chargers in mid course, and flung their long javelins at the minute but sparkling target, the imitative form of a rare and brilliant bird. The conquerors received their prizes from the hand of the princess herself, bright shawls, and jewelled daggers, and rosaries of gems. Sometimes the trumpets announced a prize from the vice-queen, sometimes from the venerable Bostenay, sometimes from the victorious generals, or the loyal deputations, sometimes from the united trades, sometimes from the city of Bagdad, sometimes from the city of Hamadan. The hours flew away in gorgeous and ceaseless variety.

“I would we were all alone, my own Schirene,” said Alroy to his bride.

“I would so too; and yet I love to see all Asia prostrate at the feet of Alroy.”

“Will the sun ne’er set! Give me thy hand to play with.”

“Hush! See Miriam smiles.”

“Lovest thou my sister, my own Schirene?”

“None dearer but thyself.”

“Talk not of my sister, but ourselves. Think—est thou the sun is nearer setting, love?”

“I cannot see; thine eyes they dazzle me—they are so brilliant, sweet!”

“Oh! my soul, I could pour out my passion on thy breast.”

“Thou art very serious.”

“Love is ever so.”

“Nay, sweet! It makes me wild and fanciful. Now I could do such things, but what I know not. I would we had wings, and then we would fly away.”

“See, I must salute this victor in the games. Must I unloose thy hand! Dear hand, farewell! Think of me while I speak, my precious life. 'Tis done. Give back thy hand, or else methinks I 'll die. What 's this!”

A horseman in no holiday dress, but covered with dust, rushed into the circus, bearing in his hand a tall lance, on which was fixed a scroll. The marshals of the games endeavoured to prevent his advance, but he would not be stayed. His message was to the king alone. A rumour of news from the army circulated throughout the crowd. And news from the army it was. Another victory! Scherirah had defeated the sultan of Roum, who was now a suppliant for peace and alliance. Sooth to say, the intelligence had arrived at dawn of day, but the courtly Honain had contrived that it should be communicated at a later and a more effective moment.

There scarcely needed this additional excitement to this glorious day. But the people cheered, the golden dirhems were scattered with renewed profusion, and the intelligence was received by all parties as a solemn ratification by Jehovah, or by Allah, of the morning ceremony.

The sun set, the court arose, and returned in the same pomp to the serail. The twilight died away, a beacon fired on a distant eminence announced the entrance of Alroy and Schirene into the nuptial chamber, and suddenly, as by magic, the mighty city, every mosque, and minaret, and tower, and terrace, and the universal plain, and the numberless pavilions, and the immense circus, and the vast and winding river, blazed with light. From every spot a lamp, a torch, a lanthorn, tinted with every hue, burst forth, enormous cressets of silver radiancy beamed on the top of each chartak, and huge bonfires of ruddy flame started up along the whole horizon.

For seven days and seven nights, this unparalleled scene of rejoicing, though ever various, never ceased. Long, long was remembered the bridal feast of the Hebrew prince and the caliph's daughter ; long, long did the peasantry on the plains of Tigris sit down by the side of that starry river, and tell the wondrous tale to their marvelling posterity.

Now what a glorious man was David Alroy, lord of the mightiest empire in the world, and wedded to the most beautiful princess, surrounded by a prosperous and obedient people, guarded by invincible armies, one on whom earth showered all its fortune, and heaven all its favour—and all by the power of his own genius!

PART IX.

I.

'Twas midnight, and the storm still raged: mid the roar of the thunder and the shrieks of the wind, the floods of forky lightning each instant revealed the broad and billowy breast of the troubled Tigris.

Jabaster stood gazing upon the wild scene from the gallery of his palace. His countenance was solemn, but disquieted.

“I would that he were here!” exclaimed the high priest. “Yet why should I desire his presence, who heralds only gloom? Yet in his absence am I gay? I am nothing. This Bagdad weighs upon me like a cloak of lead: my spirit is dull and broken.

“They say Alroy gives a grand banquet in the serail to-night, and toasts his harlot mid the thunderbolts. Is there no hand to write upon the wall? He is found wanting, he is weighed, and is indeed found wanting. The parting of his kingdom soon will come, and then—I could weep, oh! I could weep, and down these stern and seldom yielding cheeks, pour the wild anguish of my desperate wo. So young, so great, so favoured! But one more step a god, and now a foul Belshazzar!

VOL. II.—C

“ Was it for this his gentle youth was past in musing solitude and mystic studies ? Was it for this the holy messenger summoned his most religious spirit ? Was it for this he crossed the fiery desert, and communed with his fathers in their tombs ? Is this the end of all his victories, and all his vast achievement ? To banquet with a wanton !

“ A year ago this very night, it was the eve of battle, I stood within his tent to wait his final word. He mused awhile, and then he said, ‘ Good night, Jabaster ! ’ I believed myself the nearest to his heart, as he has ever been nearest to mine, but that ’s all over. He never says, ‘ Good night, Jabaster, ’ now. Why, what ’s all this ? Methinks I am a child.

“ The Lord’s anointed is a prisoner now in the light grating of a bright kiosk, and never gazes on the world he conquered. Egypt and Syria, even farthest Ind, send forth their messengers to greet Alroy, the great, the proud, the invincible. And where is he ? In a soft paradise of girls and eunuchs, crowned with flowers, listening to melting lays, and the wild trilling of the amorous lute. He spares no hours to council, all is left to his prime favourites, of whom the leader is that juggling fiend I sometime called my brother.

“ Why rest I here ? Where should I fly ? Methinks my presence is still a link to decency. Should I tear off the ephod, I scarcely fancy ’twould blaze upon another’s breast. He goes not to the sacrifice ; they say he keeps no fast, observes no ritual, and that their festive fantasies will not be balked, even by the Sabbath. I have not seen him thrice since the marriage. Honain has told her I did oppose it, and she bears to me a hatred that only women feel. Our strong passions break into a thousand purposes : women have one. Their love is dangerous, but their hate is fatal.

“ See ! a boat bounding on the waters. On such a night,—but one would dare to venture.”

Now visible, now in darkness, a single lanthorn at the prow, Jabaster watched with some anxiety the slight barque buffetting the waves. A tremendous flash of lightning illumined the whole river, and tipped with a spectral light even the distant piles of building. The boat, and the toiling figure of the single rower, were distinctly perceptible. Now all again was darkness, the wind suddenly subsided, in a few minutes the plash of the oars was audible, and the boat apparently stopped beneath the palace.

There was a knocking at the private portal.

“ Who knocks ?” inquired Jabaster.

“ A friend to Israel.”

“ Abidan, by his voice. Art thou alone ?”

“ The prophetess is with me ; only she.”

“ A moment. I’ll open the gate. Draw the boat within the arch.”

Jabaster descended from the gallery, and in a few moments returned with two visitors : the youthful prophetess Esther, and her companion, a man short in stature, but with a very powerful and well-knit frame. His countenance was very melancholy, and with much harshness in the lower part, not without a degree of pensive beauty in the broad clear brow, and sunken eyes, unusual in oriental visages.

“ A rough night,” said Jabaster.

“ To those who fear it,” replied Abidan. “ The sun has brought so little joy to me, I care not for the storm.”

“ What news ?”

“ Wo ! wo ! wo !”

“ Thy usual note, my sister. Will the day ne’er come when we may change it ?”

“ Wo ! wo ! wo ! unutterable wo !”

“ Abidan, how fares it ?”

“Very well.”

“Indeed !”

“As it may turn out.”

“You are brief.”

“Bitter.”

“Have you been to court, that you have learnt to be so wary in your words, my friend ?”

“I know not what may happen. In time we may become all courtiers, though I fear, Jabaster, we have done too much to be rewarded. I gave him my blood, and you something more, and now we are at Bagdad. 'Tis a fine city. I wish to heaven the shower of Sodom would rain upon its terraces.”

“I know thou hast something terrible to tell. I know it by that gloomy brow of thine, that lowers like the tempest. Speak out, man. I can bear the worst, for which I am prepared.”

“Take it then. Alroy has proclaimed himself caliph. Abner is made sultan of Persia. Asriel, Ithamar, Medad and the chief captains, viziers ; Honain, their chief. Four Moslemin nobles are sworn into the council. The princess goes to mosque in state next Friday ; 'tis said thy pupil doth accompany her.”

“I'll not believe it! By the God of Sinai, I'll not believe it! Were my own eye the accursed witness of the dead, I'd not believe it. Go to mosque ! They play with thee, my good Abidan, they play with thee.”

“As it may be. 'Tis a rumour, but rumours herald deeds. The rest of my intelligence is true. I had it from my kinsman, stout Zalmunna. He left the banquet.”

“Shall I go to him? Methinks one single word—To mosque! only a rumour and a false one. I'll never believe it ; no, no, no, never, never! Is he not the Lord's anointed? The ineffable curse upon this daughter of the Moabite! No marvel that it thunders! By heavens, I'll go and beard him in his orgies!"

"You know your power better than Abidan. You bearded him before his marriage, yet——"

"He married. 'Tis true. Honain, their chief. And I kept his ring! Honain is my brother. Have I ne'er a dagger to cut the bond of brotherhood?"

"We have all daggers, Jabaster, if we know but how to use them."

"'Tis strange—we met after twenty years of severance. You were not in the chamber, Abidan. 'T was at council. We met after twenty years of severance. He is my brother. 'Tis strange, I say; I felt that man shrink from my embrace."

"Honain is a philosopher, and believes in sympathy. 'T would appear there was none between you. His system, then, absolves you from all ties."

"You are sure the rest of the intelligence is true? I'll not believe the mosque—the rest is bad enough."

"Zalmunna left the banquet. Hassan Subah's brother sat above him."

"Subah's brother! 'T is all over, then. Is he of the council?"

"Ay, and others."

"Where now is Israel?"

"She should be in her tents."

"Wo! wo! wo! unutterable wo!" exclaimed the prophetess, who, standing motionless in the back of the chamber, seemed inattentive to their conversation.

Jabaster paced the gallery with agitated steps.

Suddenly he stopped, and, walking up to Abidan, seized his arm, and looked him sternly in the face. "I know thy thought, Abidan," exclaimed the priest; "but it cannot be. I have dismissed,—henceforth and for ever I have dismissed all feeling from my mind; now I have no brother, no friend, no pupil, and, I fear, no saviour. Israel is all and all to me. I have no other life—'tis not compunction, then, that stays my arm. My heart's as hard as thine."

"Why stays it, then?"

"Because with him we fall. He is the last of all his sacred line. There is no other hand to grasp our sceptre."

"Our sceptre!—what sceptre?"

"The sceptre of our kings."

"Kings!"

"Ay, why dost thou look so dark?"

"How looked the prophet when the stiff-necked populace forsooth must have a king? Did he smile? Did he shout, and clap his hands, and cry, God save his majesty! Oh, Jabaster! honoured, rare Jabaster! thou second Samuel of our light-headed people! there was a time when Israel had no king except their God. Were we viler then? Did kings conquer Canaan? Who was Moses, who was Aaron, who was mighty Joshua? Was the sword of Gideon a kingly sword? Did the locks of Sampson shade royal temples? Would a king have kept his awful covenant like solemn Jephtha? Royal words are light as air, when, to maintain them, you injure any other than a subject!"

"Kings! why what's a king? Why should one man break the equal sanctity of our chosen race? Is their blood purer than our own? We are all the seed of Abraham. Who was Saul, and who was David? I never heard they were a different breed unto our fathers. Grant them devout, which they were not ; and brave and wise, which other men were ; have their posterity a patent for all virtues ? No, Jabaster ! thou ne'er didst err, but when thou placed a crown upon this haughty stripling. What he did, a thousan' might have done. 'Twas thy mind inspired the deed. And now he is a king ; and now, Jabaster, the very soul of Israel, who should be our judge and leader—Jabaster trembles in disgrace, while our unhal- lowed sanhedrim is filled with Ammonites !”

“ Oh, Abidan ! thou hast touched me to the quick ; thou hast stirred up thoughts that ever and anon, like strong and fatal vapours, have risen from the dark abyss of thought, and I have quelled them.”

“ Let them rise, I say—let them drown the beams of that all-scorching sun we suffer under, that drinks all vegetation up, and makes us languish with a dull exhaustion.”

“ Joy ! joy ! unutterable joy !”

“ Hark ! the prophetess has changed her note ; and yet she hears us not. The spirit of the Lord is truly with her. Come, Jabaster, I see thy heart is opening to thy people's sufferings : thy people, my Jabaster, for art not thou our judge ? at least, thou shalt be.”

“ Can we call back the theocracy ?—Is 't possible ?”

“ But say the word, and it is done, Jabaster. Nay, stare not. Dost thou think there are no true ears in Israel ? Dost thou suppose thy children have beheld, without a thought, the foul insults poured on thee—thee, their priest, their adored high priest, one who recalls the best days of the past—the days of their great judges. But one word, one single movement of that mitred head, and——

But I speak unto a mind that feels more than I can express. Be silent, tongue, thou art a babbling counsellor. Jabaster's patriot soul needs not the idle schooling of a child. If he be silent, 'tis that his wisdom deems the hour's not ripe; but when her leader speaks, Israel will not be slack."

"The Moslemin in council! We know what must come next. Our national existence is in its last agony. Methinks the time is very ripe, Abidan."

"Why so we think, great sir; and say the word, and twenty thousand spears will guard the ark. I'll answer for my men. Stout Scherirah looks grimly on the Moabites. A word from thee, and the whole Syrian army will join our banner—the lion of Judah, that shall be our flag. The tyrant and his satraps, let them die, and then the rest must join us. We'll proclaim the covenant, and, leaving Babylon to a bloody fate, march on to Sion!"

"Sion, his youthful dream, Sion!"

"You muse?"

"King or no king, he is the Lord's anointed. Shall this hand, that poured the oil on his hallowed head, wash out the balmy signet with his blood! Must I slay him? Shall this kid be seethed even in its mother's milk?"

"His voice is low, and yet his face is troubled. How now, sir?"

"What art thou? Ah! Abidan, trusty, staunch Abidan! You see, Abidan, I was thinking, my good Abidan, all this may be the frenzy of a revel. To-morrow's dawn may summon cooler councils. The tattle of the table, it is sacred. Let us forget it; let us pass it over. The Lord may turn his heart. Who knows, who knows, Abidan?"

“ Noble sir, a moment since your mind was like your faith, firm and resolved, and now——”

“ School me not, school me not, good Abidan. There is that within my mind you cannot fathom ; some secret sorrows which are all my own. Leave me, good friend, leave me awhile. When Israel calls me I shall not be wanting. Be sure of that, Abidan, be sure of that. Nay, do not go; the night is very rough, and the fair prophetess should not stem again the swelling river. I’ll to my closet, and will soon return.”

Jabaster quitted the gallery, and entered a small apartment. Several large volumes, unclasped and open, were lying on various parts of the divan. Before them stood his brazen cabalistic table. He closed the chamber with a cautious air. He advanced into the centre of the apartment. He lifted up his hands to heaven, and clasped them with an expression almost of agony.

“ Is it come to this ?” he muttered in a tone of deep oppression. “ Is it come to this ? What is ’t I have heard ? what done ? Down, tempting devil, down ! Oh ! life, oh ! glory, oh ! my country, my chosen people, and my sacred creed !—why do we live, why act, why have we feeling for aught that ’s famous, or for aught that ’s holy ? Let me die, let—let me die. The torture of existence is too great.”

He flung himself upon the couch, he buried his awful countenance in his robes. His mighty heart was convulsed with passion. There did he lie, that great and solemn man, prostrate and wo-begone.

II.

“The noisy banquet lingers in my ear ; I love to be alone.”

“With me ?”

“Thou art myself ; I have no other life.”

“Sweet bird ! It is now a caliph.”

“I am what thou willest, soul of my sweet existence ! Pomp and dominion, fame and victory, seem now but flawed and dimly-shaded gems compared with thy bright smile !”

“My plaintive nightingale, shall we hunt to-day ?”

“Alas ! my rose, I’d sooner lie upon this lazy couch, and gaze upon thy beauty !”

“Or sail upon the cool and azure lake, in some bright barque, like to a sea-nymph’s shell, and followed by the swans ?”

“There is no lake so blue as thy deep eye ; there is no swan so white as thy round arm !”

“Or shall we lance our falcons in the air, and bring the golden pheasant to our feet ?”

“I am the golden pheasant at thy feet, why wouldest thou richer prey ?”

“Rememberest thou thy earliest visit to this dear kiosk, my gentle mute ? There thou stoodest with folded arms, and looks demure as day, and ever and anon with those dark eyes, stealing a glance which made my cheek quite pale. Methinks I see thee even yet, shy bird. Dost know, I was so foolish when it quitted me, dost know I cried ?”

“Ah, no ! thou didst not cry ?”

“Indeed, I think I did.”

“Tell me again, my own Schirene, indeed didst cry?”

“Indeed I did, my soul!”

“I would those tears were in some crystal vase, I’d give a province for the costly urn.”

She threw her arms around his neck and covered his face with kisses.

Sunset sounded from the minarets. They arose and wandered together in the surrounding paradise. The sky was tinted with a pale violet flush, a single star floating by the side of the white moon, that beamed with a dim lustre, soft and shapely as a pearl.

“Beautiful!” exclaimed the pensive Schirene, as she gazed upon the star. “Oh! my Alroy, why cannot we ever live alone, and ever in a paradise!”

“I am wearied of empire,” replied Alroy with a smile, “let us fly!”

“Is there no island with all that can make life charming, and yet impervious to man? How little do we require! Ah! if these gardens, instead of being surrounded by hateful Bagdad, were only encompassed by some beautiful ocean!”

“My heart, we live in a paradise, and are seldom disturbed, thanks to Honain!”

“But the very consciousness that there are any other persons existing but ourselves is to me painful. Every one who even thinks of you seems to rob me of a part of your being. Besides, I am weary of pomp and palaces. I should like to live in a sparry grot, and sleep upon a couch of sweet leaves!”

This interesting discussion was disturbed by a dwarf, who, in addition to being very small, and very ugly, was dumb. He bowed before the princess and then had recourse to a great deal of pantomimic action, by which she, at length, discovered that it was dinner-time. No other person could have ventured to disturb the royal pair, but this little being was a privileged favourite.

So Alroy and Schirene entered the serail. An immense cresset-lamp, fed with perfumed oil, threw a soft light round the sumptuous chamber. At the end stood a row of eunuchs in scarlet dresses, and each holding a tall silver staff. The caliph and the sultana threw themselves upon a couch covered with a hundred cushions ; on one side stood a group consisting of the captain of the guard and other officers of the household, on the other, of beautiful female slaves magnificently attired.

The line of domestics at the end of the apartment opened, and a body of slaves advanced, carrying trays of ivory and gold, and ebony, and silver, covered with the choicest dainties, most curiously prepared. These were in turn offered to the caliph and the sultana by their surrounding attendants. The princess accepted a spoon made of a single pearl, the long, thin golden handle of which was studded with rubies, and condescended to partake of some saffron soup, of which she was very fond. Afterwards she regaled herself with the breast of a cygnet stuffed with almonds, and stewed with violets and cream. Having now a little satisfied her appetite, and wishing to show a mark of her favour to a particular individual, she ordered the captain of the guard instantly to send him the whole of the next course(s) with her compliments. Her attention was then engaged with a dish of those delicate ortolans that feed upon the vine-leaves of Schiraz, and with which the governor of Nishabur took especial care that she should be well provided. Tearing their delicate forms to pieces with her still more delicate fingers, she insisted upon feeding Alroy, who of course yielded to her solicitations. In the meantime, they refreshed themselves with their favourite sherbet of pomegranates, and the golden wine of mount Lebanon⁽⁹⁾. The caliph, who could eat no more ortolans, although fed by such delicate fingers, was at length obliged to call for "rice," which was synonymous to commanding the banquet to disappear. The attendants now brought, to each, basins of gold, and ewers of rock crystal filled with rose-water, with towels of that rare Egyptian linen, which can only be made of the cotton that grows upon the banks of the Nile. While they amused themselves with eating sugar-plums, and drinking coffee flavoured with cinnamon, the female slaves danced before them in the most graceful attitudes to the melody of invisible musicians.

"My enchanting Schirene," said the caliph, "I have dined, thanks to your attention, very well. These slaves of yours dance admirably, and are exceedingly beautiful. Your music, too, is beyond all praise; but, for my own part, I would sooner be quite alone, and listening to one of your songs."

"I have written a new one to-day. You shall hear it." So saying, she clapped her little white hands, and the whole of the retinue immediately withdrew.

III.

"The stars are stealing forth, and so will I. Sorry sight! to view Jabaster, with a stealthy step, skulk like a thing dishonoured! Oh! may the purpose consecrate the deed—the die is cast."

VOL. II.—D

So saying the high priest, muffled up in his robe, emerged from his palace into the busy streets. It is at night that the vitality of oriental life is most impressive. The narrow winding streets, crowded with population breathing the now sufferable air, the illuminated coffee-houses, the groups of gay, yet sober revellers, the music and the dancing, and the animated recitals of the poet and the storièr, all combine to invest the starry hours with a beguiling, and even fascinating, character of enjoyment and adventure.

It was the night after the visit of Abidan and the prophetess. Jabaster had agreed to meet Abidan in the square of the great mosque two hours after sunset, and thither he now repaired.

"I am somewhat before my time," he said, as he entered the great square, over which the rising moon threw a full flood of light. A few dark shadows of human beings alone moved in the distance. The world was in the streets and coffee-houses. "I am somewhat before my time," said Jabaster. "Conspirators are watchful. I am anxious for the meeting, and yet I dread it. Since he broke this business I have never slept, My mind is a chaos. I'll not think. If 'tis to be done, let it be done at once. I am more tempted to sheathe this dagger in Jabaster's breast than in Alroy's. If life or empire were the paltry stake, I'd end a life that now can bring no joy, and yield authority that hath no charm; but Israel, Israel, thou for whom I have endured so much—let me forget Jabaster had a mother.

"But for this thought that links me with my God, and leads my temper to a higher state, how vain and sad, how wearisome and void, were this said world they think of! But for this thought I could sit down and die. Yea! my great heart could crack, worn out, worn out: my mighty passions, with their fierce but flickering flame, sink down and die, and the strong brain that e'er hath urged my course, and pricked me onward with perpetual thought, desert the rudder it so long hath held, like some baffled pilot in blank discomfiture, in the far centre of an unknown sea.

“ Study and toil, anxiety and sorrow, mighty action, perchance time and disappointment, which is worse than all, have done their work, and not in vain. I am no longer the same Jabaster that gazed upon the stars of Caucasus. Methinks even they look dimmer than of yore. The glory of my life is fading. My leaves are sear, tinged, but not tainted. I am still the same in one respect—I have not left my God, in deed or thought. Ah! who art thou ?”

“ A friend to Israel.”

“ I am glad that Israel hath a friend. Noble Abidan, I have well considered all that hath passed between us. Sooth to say, you touched upon a string I 've played before, but kept it for my loneliness; a jarring tune, indeed a jarring tune, but so it is, and being so, let me at once unto your friends, Abidan.”

“ Noble Jabaster, thou art what I deemed thee.”

“ Abidan, they say the consciousness of doing justly is the best basis of a happy mind.”

“ Even so.”

“ And thou believest it ?”

“ Without doubt.”

“ We are doing very justly ?”

“ 'Tis a weak word for such a holy purpose.”

“ I am most wretched!”

IV.

The high priest and his companion entered the house of Abidan. Jabaster addressed the already assembled guests.

“ Brave Scherirah, it joys me to find thee here. In Israel’s cause when was Scherirah wanting? Stout Zalmunna, we have not seen enough of each other: the blame is mine. Gentle prophetess, thy blessing!

“ Good friends, why we meet here is known to all. Little did we dream of such a meeting when we crossed the Tigris. But that is nothing. We come to act, and not to argue. Our great minds, they are resolved: our solemn purpose requires no demonstration. If there be one among us who would have Israel a slave to Ishmael, who would lose all we have prayed for, all we have fought for, all which we have won, and all for which we are prepared to die—if there be one among us who would have the ark polluted, and Jehovah’s altar stained with a Gentile sacrifice—if there be one among us who does not sigh for Sion, who would not yield his breath to build the temple and gain the heritage his fathers lost, why let him go! There is none such among us: then stay and free your country!”

“ We are prepared, great Jabaster; we are prepared, all, all!”

“ I know it; you are like myself. Necessity hath taught decision. Now for our plans. Speak, Zalmunna.”

“ Noble Jabaster, I see much difficulty. Alroy no longer quits his palace. Our entrance unwatched is, you well know, impossible. What say you, Scherirah?"

"I doubt not of my men, but war against Alroy is, to say nought of danger, a doubtful issue."

"I am prepared to die, but not to fail," said Abidan. "We must be certain. Open war I fear. The mass of the army will side with their leaders, and they are with the tyrant. Let us do the deed, and they must join us."

"Is it impossible to gain his presence to some sacrifice in honour of some by-gone victory—what think ye?"

"I doubt much, Jabaster. At this moment he little wishes to sanction our national ceremonies with his royal person. The woman assuredly will stay him. And even if he come, success is difficult, and therefore doubtful."

"Noble warriors, list to a woman's voice," exclaimed the prophetess, coming forward. "'Tis weak, but with such instruments, even the aspirations of a child, the Lord will commune with his chosen people. There is a secret way by which I can gain the gardens of the palace. To-morrow night, just as the moon is in her midnight bower, behold the accursed pile shall blaze. Let Abidan's troop be all prepared, and at the moment the flames first mount, march to the seraglio gate as if with aid. The affrightened guard will offer no opposition. While the troops secure the portals, you yourselves, Zalmunna, Abidan and Jabaster, rush to the royal chamber and do the deed. In the meantime, let brave Scherirah, with his whole division surround the palace, as if unconscious of the mighty work. Then come you forward, show, if it need, with tears, the fated body to the soldiery, and announce the theocracy."

the curtain. Pale and panting, she rushed back, yet with a light step. She beheld Alroy !

For a moment she leant against the wall, overpowered by her emotions. Again she advanced, and gazed on her unconscious victim.

“ Can the guilty sleep like the innocent? Who would deem this gentle slumberer had betrayed the highest trust that ever Heaven vouchsafed to favoured man? He looks not like a tyrant and a traitor : calm his brow, and mild his placid breath! His long dark hair, dark as the raven’s wing, hath broken from its fillet, and courses, like a wild and stormy night, over his pale and moon-lit brow. His cheek is delicate, and yet repose hath brought a flush ; and on his lip there seems some word of love, that will not quit it. It is the same Alroy that blessed our vision, when, like the fresh and glittering star of morn, he rose up in the desert, and, bringing joy to others, brought to me only——

“ Oh ! hush my heart, and let thy secret lie hid in the charnel-house of crushed affections. Hard is the lot of woman : to love and to conceal is our sharp doom ! Oh bitter life ! oh most unnatural lot ! Man made society, and made us slaves. And so we droop and die, or else take refuge in idle fantasies, to which we bring the fervour that is meant for nobler ends.

“ Beauteous hero ! whether I bear thee most hatred or most love, I cannot tell. Die you must ; yet I feel I should die with thee. Oh ! that tonight could lead at the same time unto our marriage bed and funeral pyre. Must that white bosom bleed ? and must those delicate limbs be hacked and handled by these bloody butchers ? Is that justice ? They lie, the traitors, when they call thee false to our God. Thou art thyself a God, and I could worship thee! See those beauteous lips—they move. Hark to the music!”

“Schirene, Schirene!”

“There wanted but that word to summon back my senses. Oh! fool, fool! where is thy fancy wandering? I’ll not wait for tardy justice. I’ll do the deed myself. Shall I not kill my Sisera?” She seized a dagger from the ottoman, a rare and highly-tempered blade. Up she raised it in the air, and dashed it to his heart, with superhuman force. It struck against the talisman which Jabaster had given Alroy, and which, from a lingering superstition he still wore; it struck, and shivered into a thousand pieces. The caliph sprang from his couch, his eyes met the prophetess, standing over him in blank despair, with the hilt of the dagger in her hand.

“What is all this! Schirene! Who art thou? Esther!” He jumped from the couch, called to Pharez, and seized her by both hands. “Speak!” he continued. “Art thou Esther? What dost thou here?”

She broke into a wild laugh; she wrestled with his grasp, and pulled him towards the gallery. He beheld the chief tower of the serail in flames. Joining her hands together, grasping them both in one of his, and dragging her towards the ottoman, he seized a helmet, and flung it upon the mighty shield. It sounded like a gong. Pharez started from his slumbers, and rushed into the chamber.

“Pharez! Treason! treason! Send instant orders that the palace gates are open on no pretence whatever. Go, fly! See the captain himself. Summon the household. Order all to arms. Speed for our lives!”

The whole palace was now roused. Alroy delivered Esther, exhausted and apparently senseless, to a guard of eunuchs. Slaves and attendants poured in from all directions. Soon arrived Schirene, with dishevelled hair and hurried robes, attended by a hundred maidens, each bearing a torch.

“My soul, what ails thee?”

“Nothing, sweetest; all will soon be well,” replied Alroy, picking up, and examining the fragments of the shivered dagger, which he had just discovered.

“My life has been attempted; the palace is in flames; I suspect the city is in insurrection. Look to your mistress, maidens!” Schirene fell into their arms. “I’ll soon be back.” So saying, he rushed to the grand court.

Several thousand persons, for the population of the serail and its liberties was very considerable, were assembled in the grand court; eunuchs, women, pages, slaves and servants, and a few soldiers. All in confusion and alarm, fire raging within, and mysterious and terrible outcries without. A cry of “the caliph! the caliph!” announced the arrival of Alroy, and produced a degree of comparative silence.

“Where’s the captain of the guard?” he exclaimed. “That’s well. Open the gates to none. Who will leap the wall, and bear a message to Asriel? You? That’s well too. To-morrow you shall yourself command. Where’s Mesrour? Take the eunuch guard and the company of gardeners(10), and suppress the flames at all cost. Pull down the intervening buildings. Abidan’s troop arrived with succour, eh! I doubt it not. I expected them. Open to none. They force an entrance—eh? I thought so. So that javelin has killed a traitor. Feed me with arms. I’ll keep the gate. Send again to Asriel. Where 's Pharez?"

"By your side, my lord."

"Run to the queen, my faithful Pharez, and tell her that all 's well. I wish it were ! Didst ever hear a din so awful? Methinks all the tambours and the cymbals of the city are in full chorus. Foul play, I guess. Oh ! for Asriel ! Has Pharez returned ?"

"I am by your side, my lord."

"How 's the queen ?"

"She would gladly join your side."

"No, no ! Keep the gates there. Who says they are making fires before them ? 'Tis true. We must sally, if the worst come to the worst, and die at least like soldiers. Oh Asriel ! Asriel !"

"May it please your highness, the troops are pouring in from all quarters."

"'Tis Asriel."

"No ! your highness, 'tis not the guard. Methinks they are Scherirah's men."

"Hum ! What it all is, I know not ; but very foul play, I do not doubt. Where 's Honain ?"

"With the queen, sire."

"'Tis well. What is that shout ?"

"Here 's the messenger from Asriel. Make way ! way !"

"Well ! how is 't, sir ?"

"Please your highness, I could not reach the guard."

"Could not reach the guard ! God of my fathers ! who should let thee ?"

"Sire, I was taken prisoner."

"Prisoner ! By the thunder of Sinai, are we at war ? Who made thee prisoner ?"

"Sire, they have proclaimed thy death."

"Who ?"

“The council of the elders. So I heard. Abidan, Zalmunna——”

“Rebels and dogs ! Who else ?”

“The high priest.”

“Hah ! Is it there ? Pharez, fetch me some drink. Is it true Scherirah has joined them ?”

“His force surrounds the serail. No aid can reach us without cutting through his ranks.”

“Oh ! that I were there with my good guard ! Are we to die here like rats, fairly murdered ? Cowardly knaves ! Hold out, hold out, my men ! 'Tis sharp work, but some of us will smile at this hereafter. Who stands by Alroy to-night bravely and truly, shall have his heart's content to-morrow. Fear not, fear not : I was not born to die in a civic broil. I bear a charmed life. So to it.”

VI.

“Go to the caliph, good Honain, I pray thee go. I can support myself, he needs thy counsel. Bid him not expose his precious life. The wicked men ! Asriel must soon be here. What sayest thou ?”

“There is no fear. Their plans are ill-devised. I have long expected this stormy night, and feel even now more anxious than alarmed.”

“'Tis I they aim at—it is I they hate. The high priest, too ! Ay, ay ! Thy proud brother, good Honain, I have ever felt he would not rest until he drove me from this throne, my right ; or washed my hated name from out our annals in my life's blood. Wicked, wicked Jabaster ! He frowned upon me from the first, Honain. Is he indeed thy brother ?”

“I care not to remember. He aims at something further than thy life ; but time will teach us more than all our thoughts.”

VII.

The fortifications of the serail resisted all the efforts of the rebels. Scherirah remained in his quarters with his troops under arms, and recalled the small force that he had originally sent out as much to watch the course of events as to assist Abidan. Asriel and Ithamar poured down their columns in the rear of that chieftain, and by dawn a division of the guard had crossed the river, the care of which had been entrusted to Scherirah, and had thrown themselves into the palace. Alroy sallied forth at the head of these fresh troops. His presence decided a result which was perhaps never doubtful. The division of Abidan fought with the desperation that became their fortunes. The carnage was dreadful, but their discomfiture complete. They no longer acted in masses, or with any general system. They thought only of self-preservation, or of selling their lives at the dearest cost. Some dispersed, some escaped. Others entrenched themselves in houses, others fortified the bazaar. All the horrors of war in the streets were now experienced. The houses were in flames, the thoroughfares flowed with blood.

At the head of a band of faithful followers Abidan proved himself by his courage and resources worthy of success. At length, he was alone, or only surrounded by his enemies. With his back against a building in a narrow street, where the number of his opponents only embarrassed them, the three foremost of his foes fell before his irresistible scimitar. The barricaded door yielded to the pressure of the multitude. Abidan rushed up the narrow stairs, and gaining a landing-place, turned suddenly round, and cleaved the skull of his nearest pursuer. He hurled the mighty body at his followers, and retarding their advance, himself dashed onward, and gained the terrace of the mansion. Three soldiers of the guard followed him as he bounded from terrace to terrace. One armed with a dart, hurled the javelin at the chieftain. The weapon slightly wounded Abidan, who, drawing it from his arm, sent it back to the heart of its owner. The two other soldiers, armed only with swords, gained upon him. He arrived at the last terrace in the cluster of buildings. He stood at bay on the brink of the precipice. He regained his breath. They approached him. He dodged them in their course. Suddenly, with admirable skill, he flung his scimitar edgewise at the legs of his farthest foe, who stopped short, roaring with pain. The chieftain sprang at the foremost, and hurled him down into the street below, where he was dashed into atoms. A trap-door offered itself to the despairing eye of the rebel. He descended and found himself in a room filled with women. They screamed, he rushed through them, and descending a staircase, entered a chamber tenanted by a bed-ridden old man. The ancient invalid inquired the cause of the uproar, and died of fright before he could receive an answer, at the sight of the awful being before him, covered with streaming blood. Abidan secured the door, washed his blood-stained face, and disguising himself in the dusty robes of the deceased Armenian, sallied forth to watch the fray. The obscure street was silent. The chieftain proceeded unmolested. At the corner he found a soldier holding a charger for his captain. Abidan unarmed, seized a poigward from the soldier's belt, and stabbed him to the heart, and vaulting on the steed, galloped towards the river. No boat was to be found; he breasted the stream upon the stout courser. He reached the opposite bank. A company of camels were reposing by the side of a fountain. Alarm had dispersed their drivers. He mounted the fleetest in appearance; he dashed to the nearest gate of the city. The guard at the gate refused him a passage. He concealed his agitation. A marriage procession arrived returning from the country. He rushed into their centre, and upset the bride in her gilded wagon. In the midst of the confusion, the shrieks, the oaths, and the scuffle, he forced his way through the gate, scoured over the country, and never stopped until he had gained the desert.

VIII.

The uproar died away. The shouts of warriors, the shrieks of women, the wild clang of warfare, all were silent. The flames were extinguished, the carnage ceased. The insurrection was suppressed, and order restored. The city, all the houses of which were closed, was patrolled by the conquering troops, and by sunset the conqueror himself, in his hall of state, received the reports and the congratulations of his chieftains. The escape of Abidan seemed counterbalanced by the capture of Jabaster. After performing prodigies of valour, the high priest had been overpowered, and was now a prisoner in the serail. The conduct of Scherirah was not too curiously criticized; a commission was appointed to inquire into the mysterious affair, and Alroy retired to the bath(11) to refresh himself after the fatigues of the first victory which he could not consider a triumph.

As he reposed upon his couch, melancholy and exhausted, Schirene was announced. The princess threw herself upon his neck, and covered him with embraces. His heart yielded to her fondness, his spirit became lighter, his depression melted away.

"My ruby!" said Schirene, and she spoke in a low smothered voice, her face hidden and nestled in his breast. "My ruby! dost thou love me?"

He smiled in fondness as he pressed her to his heart.

"My ruby, thy pearl is so frightened, it dare not look upon thee. Wicked men! 'tis I they hate, 'tis I they would destroy."

"There is no danger, sweet. 'Tis over now. Speak not—nay, do not think of it."

"Ah! wicked men! There is no joy on earth while such things live. Slay Alroy, their mighty master, who from vile slaves, hath made them princes! Ungrateful churls! I am so alarmed—I ne'er shall sleep again. What! slay my innocent bird, my pretty bird, my very heart! I'll not believe it. It is I they hate. I am sure they'll kill me. You shall never leave me, no, no, no, no! You shall not leave me, love, never, never! Didst hear a noise? Methinks they are ever here, ready to plunge their daggers in our hearts—our soft, soft hearts! I think you love me, child; indeed, I think you do!"

"Take courage, heart! There is no fear, my soul; I cannot love thee more, or else I would."

"All joy is gone! I ne'er shall sleep again. Oh my soul! art thou indeed alive? Do I indeed embrace my own Alroy, or is it all a wild and troubled dream, and are my arms clasped round a shadowy ghost, myself a spectre in a sepulchre? Wicked, wicked men! Can it indeed be true? What, slay Alroy! my joy, my only life! Ah! wo is me; our bright felicity hath fled forever!"

"Not so, sweet child; we are but as we were. A few quick hours, and all will be as bright, as if no storm had crossed our sunny days."

"Hast seen Asriel? He says such fearful things!"

"How now?"

"Ah me? I am desolate. I have no friend."

"Schirene!"

"They 'll have my blood; I know they 'll have my blood."

"Indeed, an idle fancy."

"Idle! Ask Asriel, question Ithamar. Idle! 'tis written in their tablets, their bloody scroll of rapine and of murder. Thy death led only to mine, and had they hoped my bird would but have yielded his gentle mate, they would have spared him. Ay! ay! 'tis I they hate, 'tis I they would destroy. This form, I fear it has lost its lustre, but still 'tis thine, and once thou saidst thou loved it; this form was to have been hacked and mangled, this ivory bosom was to have been ripped up and tortured, and this warm blood, that flows alone for thee, that fell Jabaster was to pour its tide upon the altar of his ancient vengeance. He ever hated me!"

"Jabaster! Schirene! Where are we, and what are we? Life, life, they lie, that call thee nature! Nature never sent these gusts of agony. Oh! my heart will break. I drove him from my thought, and now she calls him up, and now must I remember he is my—prisoner! God of heaven, God of my fathers, is it come to this? Why did he not escape? why must Abidan, a common cut-throat, save his graceless life, and this great soul, this stern and mighty being—Ah me! I have lived long enough. Would they had not failed, would——"

“ Stop, stop, Alroy! I pray thee, love, be calm. I came to soothe thee, not to raise thy passions. I did not say Jabaster willed thy death, though Asriel says so; 'tis I he wars against; and if indeed Jabaster be a man so near thy heart—if he indeed be one so necessary to thy prosperity, and cannot live in decent order with thy slave that 's here, I know my duty, sir. I would not have thy fortunes marred to save my single heart, although I think 't will break. I 'll go, I 'll die, and deem the hardest accident of life but sheer prosperity if it profit thee.”

“ Oh Schirene! what wouldst thou? This—this is torture.”

“ To see thee safe and happy; nothing more.”

“ I am both, if thou art.”

“ Care not for me, I am nothing.”

“ Thou art all—to me.

“ Calm thyself, my soul. It grieves me much that when I came to soothe I only galled thee. All 's well, all 's well. Say that Jabaster lives. What then? He lives, and may he prove more duteous than before; that 's all.”

“ He lives, he is my prisoner, he awaits his doom. It must be given.”

“ Yes, yes!”

“ Shall we pardon?”

“ My lord will do that which it pleases him.”

“ Nay, nay, Schirene, I pray thee be more kind. I am most wretched. Speak, what wouldst thou?”

“ If I must speak, I say at once—his life.”

“ Ah me!”

“ If our past loves have any charm, if the hope of future joy, not less supreme, be that which binds thee to this shadowy world, as it does me, and does alone, I say his life, his very carnal life. He stands between us and our loves, Alroy, and ever has.

There is no happiness if Jabaster breathe; nor can I be the same Schirene to thee as I have been, if this proud rebel live to spy my conduct."

"Banish him, banish him!"

"To herd with rebels. Is this thy policy?"

"Oh Schirene? I love not this man, although methinks I should; yet didst thou know but all?"

"I know too much, Alroy. From the first he has been to me a hateful thought. Come, come, sweet bird, a boon, a boon unto thy own Schirene, who was so frightened by these wicked men! I fear it has done more mischief than thou deemest. Ay! robbed us of our hopes. It may be so. A boon, a boon! it is not much I ask—a traitor's head. Come, give me thy signet ring. It will not; nay, then, I'll take it. What, resist! I know a kiss, thou hast often told me, sir, could vanquish all denial. There it is. Is't sweet? Shalt have another, and another too. I've got the ring! Farewell, my lovely bird, I'll soon return to pillow in thy nest."

IX.

"She has got the ring! What's this? what's this? Schirene! art gone? Nay, surely not. She jests. Jabaster! A traitor's head? What ho! there. Pharez, Pharez!"

"My lord."

"Passed the queen that way?"

"She did, my lord."

"In tears?"

"Nay, very joyful."

"Call Honain—quick as my thought. Honain! Honain! He waits without. I have seen the best of life, that's very sure. My heart is cracking. She surely jests. Hah! Honain. Pardon these distracted looks. Fly to the armoury! fly, fly?"

"For what, my lord?"

"Ay! for what—for what! My brain it wanders. Thy brother—thy great brother—the queen—the queen has stolen my signet ring, that is, I gave it her. Fly, fly! or in a word, Jabaster is no more. He is gone. Pharez! your arm—I swoon!"

X.

"His highness is sorely indisposed to day."

"They say he swooned this morn."

"Ay, in the bath."

"No, not in the bath. 'Twas when he heard Jabaster's death."

"How died he, sir?"

"Self-strangled. His mighty heart could not endure disgrace, and thus he ended all his glorious deeds."

"A great man!"

"We shall not soon see his match. The queen had gained his pardon, and herself flew to the armoury to bear the news—alas! too late."

"These are strange times. Jabaster dead!"

"A very great event."

"Who will be high priest?"

"I doubt the appointment will be filled up."

"Sup you with the Lord Ithamar to-night?"

"I do."

"I also. We'll go together. The queen had gained his pardon. Hum! 'tis strange."

"Passing so. They say Abidan has escaped."

"I hear it. Shall we meet Medad to-night?"

"'Tis likely."

PART X.

I.

“SHE comes not yet! her cheerful form, not yet it sparkles in our mournful sky. She comes not yet! the shadowy stars seem sad and lustreless without their queen. She comes not yet!”

*“We are the watchers of the moon,
and live in loneliness to herald light.”*

“She comes not yet! her sacred form, not yet it summons to our holy feast. She comes not yet! our brethren far wait mute and motionless the saintly beam. She comes not yet!”

*“We are the watchers of the moon,
and live in loneliness to herald light.”*

“She comes, she comes! her beauteous form sails with soft splendour in the glittering air. She comes, she comes! The beacons fire, and tell the nation that the month begins? She comes, she comes!”

“We are the watchers of the moon(12), to tell the nation that the month begins.”

Instantly the holy watchers fired the beacons on the mountain top, and anon a thousand flames blaze round the land. From Caucasus to Lebanon, on every peak a crown of light!

II.

“Sire! a tatar has arrived from Hamadan, who will see none but thyself. I have told him your highness was engaged, and sent him to the Lord Honain; but all denial is lost upon him. And, as I thought perhaps the lady Miriam—”

“From Hamadan? You did well, Pharez. Admit him.”

The tatar entered.

“Well, sir; good news I hope!”

“Sire, pardon me, the worst. I come from the Lord Abner, with orders to see the caliph, and none else.”

“Well, sir, you see the caliph. Your mission? What of the viceroy?”

“Sire, he bid me tell thee, that the moment the beacon that announced the feast of the new moon was fired on Caucasus, the dreaded monarch of Karasmé, the great Alp Arslan, entered thy kingdom, and now o’erruns all Persia.”

“Hah! and Abner?”

“Is in the field, and prays for aid.”

“He shall have it. This indeed is great news! When left you Hamadan?”

“Night and day I have journeyed upon the swiftest dromedary. The third morn sees me at Bagdad.”

“You have done your duty. See this faithful courier be well tended, Pharez. Summon the Lord Honain.

“Alp Arslan! Hah! a very famous warrior. The moment the beacon was fired. No sudden impulse then, but long matured. I like it not.”

“Sire,” said Pharez, re-entering, “a tatar has arrived from the frontiers of the province, who will see none but thyself. I have told him your highness is deeply busied, and as methinks he brings but the same news, I—”

“’Tis very likely; yet never think, good Pharez. I’ll see the man.”

The tatar entered.

“Well, sir, how now!—from whom?”

“From Mozul. The governor bid me see the caliph and none else, and tell your highness, that the moment the beacon that announced the feast of the new moon was fired on the mountains, the fell rebel Abidan raised the standard of Judah in the province, and proclaimed war against your majesty.”

“In any force?”

“The royal power keeps within their walls.”

“Sufficient answer. Part of the same movement. We shall have some trouble. Hast summoned Honain?”

“I have, sir.”

“Go, see this messenger be duly served, and Pharez——come hither: let none converse with them. You understand?”

“Your highness may assure yourself.”

“Abidan come to life! He shall not escape so well this time. I must see Scherirah. I much suspect——what’s this? More news!”

A third tatar entered.

“May it please your highness, this tatar has arrived from the Syrian frontier.”

“Mischief in the wind, I doubt not. Speak out, knave.”

“Sire! pardon me, I bear but sad intelligence.”

“Out with the worst!”

“I come from the Lord Medad.”

“ Well ! has he rebelled ? It seems a catching fever.”

“ Ah ! no, dread sire, Lord Medad has no thought but for thy glory. Alas ! alas ! he has now to guard it 'gainst fearful odds. Lord Medad bid me see the caliph and none else, and tell your highness, that the moment the beacon that announced the feast of the new moon was fired on Lebanon, the sultan of Roum and the old Arabian caliph unfurled the standard of their prophet in great array, and are now marching towards Bagdad.”

“ A clear conspiracy ! Has Honain arrived ! Summon a council of the viziers instantly. The world is up against me. Well ! I 'm sick of peace. They shall not find me napping !”

III.

“ You see, my lords,” said Alroy, ere the council broke up, “ we must attack them singly. There can be no doubt of that. If they join, we must combat at great odds. 'Tis in detail that we must rout them. I will myself to Persia. Ithamar must throw himself between the sultan and Abidan ; Medad fall back on Ithamar. Scherirah must guard the capital. Honain, you are regent. And so farewell. I shall set off to-night. Courage, brave companions. 'Tis a storm, but many a cedar survives the thunderbolt.”

The council broke up.

“ My own Scherirah !” said the caliph, as they retired, “ stay awhile. I would speak with you alone. Honain,” continued Alroy, following the grand vizier out of the chamber, and leaving Scherirah alone ;

"Honain, I have not yet interchanged a word with you in private. What think you of all this?"

"Sire, I am prepared for the worst, but hope for the best."

"'Tis wise. If Abner could only keep that Kasmian in check! I am about to speak with Scherirah alone. I do suspect him much."

"I 'll answer for——his treason."

"Hah! I do suspect him. Therefore I give him no command. I would not have him too near his old companion, eh? We 'll garrison the city with his rebels."

"Sire, these are not moments to be nice. Scherirah is a valiant captain, a very valiant captain, but——lend me thy signet ring, I pray thee, sire."

Alroy turned pale. "No sir, it has left me once, and never shall again. You have touched upon a string that makes me sad. There is a burthen on my conscience—why, or what, I know not. I am innocent, you know I am innocent, Honain?"

"I 'll answer for your highness. He who has enough of the milk of human kindness to spare a thing like Scherirah when he stands in his way, may well be credited for the nobler mercy that spared his better."

"Ah me! there 's madness in the thought. Why is he not here! Had I but followed—tush! tush! Go see the queen and tell her all that has happened. I 'll to Scherirah."

The caliph returned.

"Thy pardon, brave Scherirah; in these moments my friends will pardon courtesy."

"Your highness is too considerate."

"You see, Scherirah, how the wind blows, brave heart. There 's much to do, no doubt. I am in sad want of some right trusty friend, on whose devoted bosom I can pillow all my necessities. I was thinking of sending you against this Arslan, but perhaps 'tis better that I should go myself. These are moments one should not seem to shrink, and yet we know not how affairs may run—no, we know not. The capital, the surrounding province—one disaster and these false Moslemin may rise against us. I should stay here, but if I leave Scherirah I leave myself. I feel that deeply—'tis a consolation. It may be that I must fall back upon the city. Be prepared, Scherirah. Let me fall back upon supporting friends. You have a great trust. Oh! use it wisely! worthily I am sure you must do."

"Your highness may rest assured I have no other thought but for your weal and glory. Doubt not my devotion, sire. I am not one of those mealy-mouthed youths, full of their own deeds and lip-worship, sire, but I have a life devoted to your service, and ready at all times to peril all things."

"I know that, Scherirah, I know it, I feel it deeply. What think you of these movements?"

They are not ill combined, and yet I doubt not your majesty will prove your fortunes most triumphant."

"Think you the soldiery are in good cue?"

"I'll answer for my own. They are rough fellows, like myself, a little too blunt, perhaps, your highness. We are not holiday guards, but we know our duty, and we will do it."

"That's well, that's all I want. I shall review the troops before I go. Let a donative be distributed among them; and, by-the-by, I have always forgotten it, your legion should be called the legion of Syria. We owe our fairest province to their arms."

“I shall convey to them your highness’s wish. Were it possible, ’twould add to their devotion.”

“I do not wish it. They are my very children. Sup at the serail to-night, Scherirah. We shall be very private. Yet let us drink together ere we part. We are old friends, you know. Hast not forgotten our ruined city?”

IV.

Alroy entered the apartment of Schirene. “My soul! thou knowest all?”

She sprang forward and threw her arms around his neck.

“Fear not, my life, we’ll not disgrace our queen. ’Twill be quick work. Two-thirds of them have been beaten before, and for the new champion, our laurels must not fade, and his blood shall nourish fresh ones.”

“Dearest, dearest Alroy, go not thyself, I pray thee. May not Asriel conquer?”

“I hope so—in my company. For a time we part, a short one. ’Tis our first parting: may it be our last!”

“Oh! no, no, no: oh! say not we must part.”

“The troops are under arms; to-morrow’s dawn will hear my trumpet.”

“I will not quit thee, no! I will not quit thee. What business has Schirene without Alroy? Hast thou not often told me I am thy inspiration? In the hour of danger shall I be wanting? Never! I will not quit thee; no, I will not quit thee.”

“Thou art ever present in my thoughts, my soul. In the battle I shall think of her for whom alone I conquer.”

“Nay, nay, I’ll go, indeed I must, Alroy. I’ll be no hindrance, trust me, sweet boy, I will not. I’ll have no train, no, not a single maid. Credit me, I know how a true soldier’s wife should bear herself. I’ll watch thee sleeping, and I’ll tend thee wounded, and when thou goest forth to combat I’ll gird thy sabre round thy martial side, and whisper triumph with victorious kisses.”

“My own Schirene, there’s victory in thine eyes. We’ll beat them, girl.”

“Abidan, doubly false Abidan! would he were doubly hanged! Ere she died, the fatal prophetess foretold this time, and gloated on his future treachery.”

“Think not of him.”

“And the Karasmian——think you he is very strong?”

“Enough, love, for our glory. He is a potent warrior: I trust that Abner will not rob us of our intended victory.”

“So you triumph, I care not by whose sword. Dost go indeed to-morrow?”

“At the break of dawn. I pray thee stay, my sweet!”

“Never! I will not quit thee. I am quite prepared. At the break of dawn? ’Tis near on midnight now. I’ll lay me down upon this couch awhile, and travel in my litter. Art sure Alp Arslan is himself in the field?”

“Quite sure, my sweet.”

“Confusion on his crown! We’ll conquer. Goes Asriel with us?”

“Ay!”

“That’s well; at break of dawn. I’m somewhat drowsy. Methinks I’ll sleep awhile.”

“Do, my best heart; I’ll to my cabinet, and at break of dawn I’ll wake thee with a kiss.”

V.

The caliph repaired to his cabinet, where his secretaries were occupied in writing. As he paced the chamber, he dictated to them the necessary instructions.

“Who is the officer on guard?”

“Benaiah, sire.”

“I remember him. He saved me a broken skull upon the Tigris. This is for him. The queen accompanies us. She is his charge. These papers for the vizier. Let the troops be under arms by day-break. This order of the day for the Lord Asriel. Send this instantly to Hamadan. Is the tatar despatched to Medad? 'Tis well. You have done your duty. Now to rest. Pharez!”

“My lord!”

“I shall not sleep to-night. Give me my drink. Go rest, good boy. I have no wants. Good night.”

“Good night, my gracious lord!”

“Let me ponder! I am alone. I am calm, and yet my spirit is not quick. I am not what I was. Four-and-twenty hours ago who would have dreamed of this? All at stake again! Once more in the field, and struggling at once for empire and existence! I do lack the mighty spirit of my former days. I am not what I was. I have little faith. All about me seems changed and dull and grown mechanical. Where are those flashing eyes and conquering visages that clustered round me on the battle eve, round me, the Lord's anointed! I see none such. They are changed, as I am. Why! this Abidan was a host, and now he fights against.

me. She spoke of the prophetess; I remember that woman was the stirring trumpet of our ranks, and now where is she? The victim of my justice! And where is he, the mightier far, the friend, the counsellor, the constant guide, the master of my boyhood; the firm, the fond, the faithful guardian of all my bright career, whose days and nights were one unbroken study to make me glorious! Alas! I feel more like a doomed and desperate renegade than a young hero on the eve of battle, flushed with the memory of unbroken triumphs!

“Hah! what awful form art thou that rises from the dusky earth before me? Thou shouldst be one I dare not name, yet will—the likeness of Jabaster. Away! why frownest thou upon me? I did not slay thee. Do I live, or dream, or what? I see him, ay! I see thee. I fear thee not, I fear nothing. I am Alroy.

“Speak, oh! speak! I do conjure thee, mighty spectre, speak. By all the memory of the past, although ’tis madness, I do conjure thee, let me hear again the accents of my boyhood.”

“Alroy, Alroy, Alroy!”

“I listen, as to the last trump.”

“Meet me on the plain of Nehauend.”

“’Tis gone! As it spoke, it vanished. It was Jabaster! God of my fathers, it was Jabaster! Life is growing too wild. My courage is broken! I could lie down and die. It was Jabaster! The voice sounds in my ear like distant thunder: ‘Meet me on the plain of Nehauend.’ I’ll not fail thee, noble ghost, although I meet my doom. Jabaster! Have I seen Jabaster! Indeed, indeed! Methinks I’m mad. Hah! what’s that?”

An awful clap of thunder broke over the palace, followed by a strange clashing sound that seemed to come from one of the chambers. The walls of the serail rocked.

“An earthquake!” exclaimed Alroy. “Would the earth would open and swallow all. Hah! Pharez, has it roused thee, too! Pharez! Pharez! we live in strange times.”

“Your highness is very pale.”

“And so art thou, lad! Wouldst have me merry? Pale! we may well be pale, didst thou know all. Hah! that awful sound again! I cannot bear it, Pharez, I cannot bear it. I have borne many things, but this I cannot.”

“My lord, ’tis in the armory.”

“Run, see. No, I’ll not be alone, I’ll not be alone. Where’s Benaiah? Let him go. Stay with me, Pharez, stay with me. I pray thee stay, my child.”

Pharez led the caliph to a couch, on which Alroy lay pale and trembling. In a few minutes he inquired whether Benaiah had returned.

“Even now he comes, sire.”

“Well, how is it?”

“Sire! a most awful incident. As the thunder broke over the palace, the sacred standard fell from its resting-place, and has shivered into a thousand pieces. Strange to say, the sceptre of Solomon can neither be found nor traced.”

“Say nothing of the past as ye love me, lads. Let none enter the armory. Leave me, Benaiah, leave me, Pharez.”

They retired. Alroy watched their departure with a glance of inexpressible anguish. The moment that they had disappeared, he flew to the couch, and throwing himself upon his knees, and covering his face with his hands, burst into passionate tears, and exclaimed:—“Oh! my God, I have deserted thee, and now thou hast deserted me!"

VI.

Exhausted and desperate, sleep crept over the senses of the caliph. He threw himself upon the divan, and was soon buried in profound repose. He might have slept an hour; he awoke suddenly. From the cabinet in which he slept, you entered through a lofty and spacious arch, generally covered with drapery, which was now withdrawn, into an immense hall. To the astonishment of Alroy, this presence-chamber apparently at this moment blazed with light. He rose suddenly from his couch, he advanced—he perceived, with feelings of curiosity and fear, that the hall was filled with beings, terrible indeed to behold, but to his sight more terrible than strange. In the colossal and mysterious forms that lined the walls of the mighty chamber, and each of which held in its extended arm a streaming torch, he recognized the awful Afrits. At the end of the hall, upon a sumptuous throne, surrounded by priests and courtiers, there was seated a monarch, on whom Alroy had before gazed, Solomon the great! Alroy beheld him in state and semblance, the same Solomon, whose sceptre the prince of the captivity had seized in the royal tombs of Judah.

The strange assembly seemed perfectly unconscious of the presence of the child of earth, who, with a desperate courage, leant against a column of the arch, and watched, with wonder, their mute and motionless society. Nothing was said, nothing done. No one moved, no one, even by gesture, seemed sensible of the presence of any other apparition save himself.

Suddenly there advanced from the bottom of the hall, near unto Alroy, a procession. Pages and dancing girls, with eyes of fire, and voluptuous gestures, warriors with mighty arms, and venerable forms, with ample robes and flowing beards. And as they passed, even with all the activity of their gestures, they made no sound; neither did the musicians, whereof there was a great band playing upon harps and psalteries, and timbrels and cornets, break, in the slightest degree, the almighty silence.

This great crowd poured on in beautiful order, the procession never terminating, yet passing thrice round the hall, bowing to him that was upon the throne, and ranging themselves in ranks before the Afrits.

And there came in twelve forms, bearing a great seal. The stone green, and the engraven characters of living flame, and the characters were those on the talisman of Jabaster, which Alroy still wore next to his heart. And the twelve forms placed the great seal before Solomon, and humbled themselves, and the king bowed. At the same moment, Alroy was sensible of a pang next to his heart. He instantly put his hand to the suffering spot, and lo! the talisman crumbled into dust.

The procession ceased, a single form advanced. Recent experience alone prevented Alroy from sinking before the spectre of Jabaster. Such was the single form. It advanced, bearing the sceptre. It advanced, it knelt before the throne, it offered the sceptre to the crowned and solemn vision. And the form of Solomon extended its arm, and took the sceptre, and instantly the mighty assembly vanished!

Alroy advanced immediately into the chamber, but all was dark and silent. A trumpet sounded. He recognized the note of his own soldiery. He groped his way to a curtain, and pulling it aside, beheld the first streak of dawn.

VII.

Once more upon his charger, once more surrounded by his legions, once more his senses dazzled and inflamed by the waving banners and the inspiring trumpets, once more conscious of the power still at his command, and the mighty stake for which he was about to play, Alroy in a great degree recovered his usual spirit and self-possession. His energy returned with his excited pulse, and the vastness of the impending danger seemed only to stimulate the fertility of his genius.

He pushed on with forced marches towards Media, at the head of fifty thousand men. At the end of the second day's march, fresh couriers arrived from Abner, informing him that, unable to resist the valiant and almost innumerable host of the king of Karasmé, he had entirely evacuated Persia, and has concentrated his forces in Louristan. Alroy, in consequence of this information, dispatched orders to Scherirah, to join him with his division instantly, and leave the capital to its fate.

They passed again the mountains of Kerrund, and joined Abner and the army of Media thirty thousand strong, on the river Abzah. Here Al-roy rested one night, to refresh his men, and on the ensuing morn pushed on to the Persian frontier, unexpectedly attacked the advanced posts of Alp Arslan, and beat them back, with great loss, into the province. But the force of the king of Karasmé was so considerable, that the caliph did not venture on a general engagement, and therefore he fell back, and formed in battle array upon the neighbouring plain of Nehauend, the theatre of one of his earliest and most brilliant victories, where he awaited the hourly expected arrival of Scherirah.

The king of Karasmé, who was desirous of bringing affairs to an issue, and felt confident in his superior force, instantly advanced. In two or three days at farthest, it was evident that a battle must be fought that would decide the fate of the East.

On the morn ensuing their arrival at Nehauend, while the caliph was out hunting, attended only by a few officers, he was suddenly attacked by an ambushed band of Karasmians. Alroy and his companions defended themselves with such desperation that they at length succeeded in beating off their assailants, although triple their amount in number. The leader of the Karasmians, as he retreated, hurled a dart at the caliph, which must have been fatal, had not a young officer of the guard interposed his own breast, and received the deadly wound. The party, in confusion, returned with all speed to the camp, Alroy himself bearing the expiring victim of desperate loyalty and military enthusiasm.

The bleeding officer was borne to the royal pavilion, and placed upon the imperial couch. The most skilful leech was summoned; but he examined the wound, and shook his head. The dying warrior was himself sensible of his desperate condition. His agony could only be alleviated by withdrawing the javelin, which would occasion his immediate decease. He desired to be left alone with his sovereign.

“Sire!” said the officer, “I must die ; and I die without a pang. To die in your service, I have ever considered the most glorious end. Destiny has awarded it to me ; and if I have not met my fate upon the field of battle, it is some consolation that my death has preserved the most valuable of lives. Sire ! I have a sister.”

“Waste not thy strength, dear friend, in naming her. Rest assured I shall ever deem thy relatives my own.”

“I doubt it not. Would I had a thousand lives for such a master ! I have a burthen on my conscience, sire, nor can I die in peace unless I name it.”

“Speak, speak freely. If thou hast injured any one, and the power or wealth of Alroy can redeem thy oppressed spirit, he’ll not spare—he’ll not spare, be assured of that.”

“Noble, noble master, I must be brief ; for although while this javelin rests within my body, I yet may live, the agony is great. Sire, the deed of which I speak doth concern thee.”

“Ay !”

“I was on guard the day Jabaster died.”

“Powers of heaven ! I am all ears. Speak on, speak on !”

“He died self-strangled, so they say ?”

“So they ever told me.”

“Thou art innocent, thou art innocent I thank my God, my king is innocent.”

“Rest assured of that, as there is hope in Israel, I pray thee tell me all.”

“The queen came with the signet ring. To such authority I yielded way. She entered, and after her, the Lord Honain. I heard high words, I heard Jabaster's voice. He struggled, yes! he struggled; but his mighty form, wounded and fettered, could not long resist. Foul play, foul play, sire! What could I do against such adversaries? They left the chamber with a stealthy step. Her eyes met mine. I never could forget that fell and glittering visage."

"Thou ne'er hast spoken of this awful end?"

"To none but thee. And why I speak it now I cannot tell, save that it seems some inspiration urges me; and methinks they, who did this, may do even feller works, if such there be."

"Thou hast robbed me of all peace and hope of peace—and yet I thank thee. Now I know the worth of life. I have never loved to think of that sad day, and yet, though I have sometimes dreamed of villainous work, the worst were innocence to thy dread tale."

"'Tis told; and now I pray thee secure thy secret, by drawing from my agonized frame this javelin."

"Trusty heart, 'tis a sad office."

"I shall die with joy if thou performest it."

"'Tis done."

"God save Alroy!"

VIII.

While Alroy, plunged in thought, stood over the body of the officer, there arose a flourish of triumphant music, and an eunuch entering the pavilion, announced the arrival of Schirene from Kerrund.—Almost immediately afterwards the princess, descending from her litter, entered the tent; Alroy tore off his robe, and threw it over the corpse.

“My own,” exclaimed the princess, as she ran up to the caliph, “I have heard all. Be not alarmed for me. I dare look upon a corpse. You know I am a soldier’s bride. I am used to blood.”

“Alas! Alas!”

“Why art thou so pale? Thou dost not kiss me! Has this unhinged thee so? ’Tis a sad deed; and yet to-morrow’s dawn may light up thousands to as grim a fate. Why! thou tremblest! Alas! kind soul! The single death of this fond, faithful heart hath quite upset my love. Yet art thou used to battle. Why! this is foolishness. Art not glad to see me? What, not one smile! . And I have come to fight for thee! I will be kissed!”

She flung herself upon his neck. Alroy faintly returned her embrace, and bore her to a couch.— He clapped his hands, and two soldiers entered and bore away the corpse.

“The pavilion, Schirene, is now fitter for thy presence. Rest thyself; I shall soon return.”— Thus speaking, he quitted her.

He quitted her; but her humbled look of sorrowful mortification pierced to his heart. He thought of all her love, and all her loveliness; he called to mind all the marvellous story of their united fortunes. He felt that for her, and her alone, he cared to live; that without her quick sympathy, even success seemed unendurable. His judgment fluctuated in an eddy of passion and reason. Passion conquered. He dismissed from his intelligence all cognizance of good and evil; he determined, under all circumstances, to cling ever to her; he tore from his mind all memory of the late disclosure. He returned to the pavilion with a countenance beaming with affection; he found her weeping, he folded her in his arms, he kissed her with a thousand kisses, and whispered between each kiss, his ardent love.

IX.

'Twas midnight. Schirene reposed in the arms of Alroy. The caliph, who was restless and anxious for the arrival of Scherirah, was scarcely slumbering, when the sound of a voice perfectly aroused him. He looked around; he beheld the spectre of Jabaster. His hair stood on end, his limbs seemed to loosen, a cold dew crept over his frame, as he gazed upon the awful form within a yard of his couch. Unconsciously he disembarassed his arms of their fair burthen, and rising on the couch, leant forward.

“Alroy, Alroy, Alroy!”

“I am here.”

“To-morrow Israel is avenged!”

“Who is that?” exclaimed the princess, wakening.

In a frenzy of fear, Alroy, quite forgetting the spectre, turned and pressed his hand to her sight. When he again looked round, the apparition was invisible.

“What wouldst thou, Alroy?”

“Nothing, sweet! A soldier’s wife must bear strange sights, yet I would save you some. One of my men, forgetting you were here, burst into my tent in such a guise, as scarce would suit a female eye. I must away, my child. I’ll call thy slaves. One kiss! Farewell! but for a time.”

X.

“To-morrow Israel will be avenged. What, in Karasmian blood! I have no faith. No matter. All is now beyond my influence. A rushing destiny carries me onward. I cannot stem the course, nor guide the vessel. How now! Who is the officer on guard?"

"Benomi, sire, thy servant."

"Send to the viceroy. Bid him meet me here. Who is this?"

"A courier from the Lord Scherirah, sire, but just arrived. He passed last night the Kerrund mountains, sire, and will be with you by the break of day."

"Good news, good news. Go fetch Abner. Haste! He'll find me here anon. I'll visit the camp awhile. Well, my brave fellows, you have hither come to conquer again with Alroy. You have fought before, I warrant, on the plain of Nehauend. 'Tis a rich soil, and shall be richer with Karasmian gore."

"God save your majesty! Our lives are thine."

"Please you, my little ruler," said a single soldier, addressing Alroy; "pardon my bluntness, but I knew you before you were a caliph."

"Stout heart, I like thy freedom. Pr'ythee say on."

"I was saying, I hope you'll lead us in the charge to-morrow. Some say you will not."

"They say falsely."

"I thought so. I'll ever answer for my little ruler—but then the queen?"

"Is a true soldier's wife, and lives in the camp."

That's brave! There, I told you so, comrades; you would not believe me, but I knew our little ruler before you did. I lived near the gate at Hamadan, please your highness—old Shelomi's son."

"Give me thy hand—a real friend. What is 't ye eat here, boys? Let me taste your mess. I' faith I would my cook could dress me such a pilau! 'Tis admirable!"

The soldiers gathered round their chieftain with eyes beaming with adoration. 'Twas a fine picture—the hero in the centre, the various groups around, some conversing with him, some cooking, some making coffee, all offering him by word or deed some testimonial of their devotion, and blending with that devotion the most perfect frankness.

"We shall beat them, lads!"

"There is no fear with you, you always beat."

"I do my best, and so do you. A good general without good troops is little worth."

"I' faith that 's true. One must have good troops. What think you of Alp Arslan?"

"I think he may give us as much trouble as all our other enemies together, and that 's not much."

"Brave, brave! God save Alroy!"

Benomi approached, and announced that the viceroy was in attendance.

"I must quit you, my children," said Alroy.

"We 'll sup once more together when we have conquered."

"God save you, sire; and we will confound your enemies."

"Good night, my lads. Ere the dawn break we may have hot work."

"We are ready, we are ready. God save Alroy!"

"They are in good cue, and yet 'twas a different spirit that inspired our early days. That I strongly feel. These are men true to a leader, who has never failed them, and confident in a cause that leads to—plunder. They are but splendid mercenaries. No more. Oh! where are now the fighting men of Judah! Where are the men who, when they drew their scimitars, joined in a conquering psalm of holy triumph! Last eve of battle you would have thought the field a mighty synagogue. Priests and altars, flaming sacrifices, and smoking censers, groups of fiery zealots hanging with frenzy on prophetic lips, and sealing with their blood and holiest vows, a solemn covenant to conquer Canaan. All is changed, as I am. How now, Abner? You are well muffled!”

“Is it true Scherirah is at hand?”

“I doubt not all is right. Would that the dawn would break!”

“The enemy is advancing. Some of their columns are in sight. My scouts have dodged them. They intend doubtless to form upon the plain.”

“They are in sight, eh! Then we will attack them at once, ere they are formed. Rare, rare! We ’ll beat them yet. Courage, dear brother. Scherirah will be here at dawn in good time, very good time—very, very good time.”

“I like the thought.”

“The men are in good heart. At break of dawn charge with thirty thousand cavalry upon their forming ranks. I ’ll take the right, Asriel the left. It shall be a family affair, dear Abner. How is Miriam?”

“I heard this morn, quite well. She sends you her love and prayers. The queen is here?”

“She came this eve. Quite well.”

“She must excuse all courtesy.”

“Say nothing. She is a soldier’s wife. She loves thee well, dear Abner.”

“I know that. I hope my sword may guard her children’s throne.”

“Well, give thy orders. Instant battle, eh?”

“Indeed, I think so.”

“I’ll send couriers to hurry Scherirah. All looks well. Reserve the guard.”

“Ay, ay! Farewell, dear sire. When we meet again, I trust your enemies may be your slaves!”

XI.

At the first streak of dawn the Hebrew cavalry, with the exception of the guard, charged the advancing columns of the Karasmians with irresistible force, and cut them to pieces. Alp Arslan rallied his troops, and at length succeeded in forming his main body in good order. Alroy and Asriel led on their divisions, and the battle now became general. It raged for several hours, and was on both sides well maintained. The slaughter of the Karasmians was great, but their stern character and superior numbers counterbalanced for a time all the impetuosity of the Hebrews, and all the energy of their leaders. This day Alroy threw into shade all his former exploits. Twelve times he charged at the head of the sacred guard, and more than once penetrated to the pavilion of Alp Arslan.

In vain he endeavoured singly, and hand to hand, to meet that famous chieftain. Both monarchs fought in the ranks, and yet fate decided that their scimitars should never cross. Four hours before noon it was evident to Alroy, that unless Scherirah arrived, he could not prevail against the vast superiority of numbers. He was obliged early to call his reserve into the field, and although the number of the slain on the side of Arslan exceeded any in the former victories of the Hebrews, still the Karasmians maintained an immense front, which was constantly supplied by fresh troops. Confident in his numbers, and aware of the weakness of his antagonists, Arslan contented himself with acting on the defensive, and wearying his assailants by resisting their terrible and repeated charge.

For a moment, Alroy at the head of the sacred guard had withdrawn from the combat. Abner and Asriel still maintained the fight, and the caliph was at the same time preparing for new efforts, and watching with anxiety the arrival of Scherirah. In the fifth hour, from an eminence he marked with exultation the advancing banners of his expected succours. Confident now that the day was won, he announced the exhilarating intelligence to his soldiers; and while they were excited by the animating intelligence, led them once more to the charge. It was irresistible; Scherirah seemed to have arrived only for the pursuit, only in time to complete the victory. What then was the horror, the consternation of Alroy, when Benaiah, dashing up to him, informed him that the long-expected succours consisted of the united forces of Scherirah and Abidan, and had attacked him in the rear. Human genius could afford no resource. The exhausted Hebrews, whose energies had been racked to the utmost, were surrounded. The Karasmians made a general and simultaneous advance. In a few minutes the Hebrew army was disorganized. The stoutest warriors threw away their swords in despair. Every one thought only of self-preservation. Even Abner fled towards Hamadan. Asriel was slain. Alroy, finding that it was all over, rushed to his pavilion at the head of about three hundred of the guards, seized the fainting Schirene, and threw her before him on his saddle, and cutting his way through all obstacles, dashed into the desert.

For eight-and-forty hours they never stopped. Their band was soon reduced one-third. On the morning of the third day they dismounted and refreshed themselves at a well. Half only regained their saddles. Schirene never spoke. On they rushed again, each hour losing some exhausted co-mate. At length, on the fifth day, about eighty strong, they arrived at a grove of palm-trees. Here they dismounted. And Alroy took Schirene in his arms, and the shade seemed to revive her. She opened her eyes, and pressed his hand and smiled. He gathered her some dates, and she drank some water.

"Our toils will soon be over, sweetest," he whispered to her; "I have lost every thing but thee."

Again they mounted, and proceeding at a less rapid pace, they arrived towards evening at the ruined city, whither Alroy all this time had been directing his course. Dashing down the great street, they at length entered the old amphitheatre. They dismounted. Alroy made a couch with their united cloaks for Schirene. Some collected fuel, great stores of which was found, and lit large fires. Others, while it was yet light, chased the gazelles, and were sufficiently fortunate to provide their banquet, or fetched water from the well known to their leader. In an hour's time, clustering round their fires in groups, and sharing their rude fare, you might have deemed them, instead of the discomfited and luxurious guards of a mighty monarch, the accustomed tenants of this wild abode.

"Come, my lads," said Alroy, as he rubbed his hands over the ascending flame, "at any rate this is better than the desert!"

XII.

After all his exertions, Alroy fell into profound and dreamless sleep. When he awoke, the sun had been long up, Schirene was still slumbering. He kissed her, and she opened her eyes and smiled.

"You are now a bandit's bride," he said with a smile. "How like you our new life?"

"Well! with thee."

"Rest here, my sweetest; I must rouse our men, and see how fortune speeds." So saying, and tripping lightly over many a sleeping form, he touched Benalah.

"So! my brave captain of the guard, still napping! Come! stir, stir."

Benaiah jumped up with a cheerful face. "I am ever ready, sire."

"I know it; but remember I am no more a king, only a co-mate. Away with me, and let us form some order."

The companions quitted the amphitheatre and reconnoitred the adjoining buildings. They found many stores, the remains of old days, mats, tents, and fuel, drinking bowls, and other homely furniture. They fixed upon a building for their stable, and others for the accommodation of their band. They summoned their companions to the open place, the scene of Hassan Subah's fate, where Alroy addressed them and developed to them his plans. They were divided into companies; each man had his allotted duty. Some were placed on guard at different parts ; some were sent out to the chase, or to collect dates from the oasis ; others led the horses to the contiguous pasture, or remained to complete their interior arrangements. The amphitheatre was cleared out. A rude but convenient pavilion was formed for Schirene. They covered its ground with mats, and each emulated the other in his endeavours to study her accommodation. Her kind words and inspiring smiles animated at the same time their zeal and their invention.

They soon became accustomed to their rough but adventurous life. Its novelty pleased them, and the perpetual excitement of urgent necessity left them no time to mourn over their terrible vicissitudes. While Alroy lived, hope indeed never deserted their sanguine bosoms. And such was the influence of his genius, that the most desponding felt that to be discomfited with him was preferable to conquest with another. They were a faithful and devoted band, and merry faces were not wanting when at night they assembled in the amphitheatre for their common meal.

No sooner had Alroy completed his arrangements than he sent forth spies in all directions to procure intelligence, and especially to communicate, if possible, with Ithamar and Medad, provided they still survived and maintained themselves in any force.

A fortnight passed away without the approach of any stranger ; at the end of which there arrived our personages at their haunt, not very welcome to their chief, who, however, concealed his chagrin at their appearance. These were Kisloch the Courd, and Calidas the Indian, and their inseparable companions, the Guebre and the Negro.

XIII.

“Noble Captain,” said Kisloch, “we trust that you will permit us to enlist in the band. This is not the first time we have served under your orders in this spot. Old co-mates i’ faith, who have seen the best and the worst. We suspected where you might be found, although, thanks to the ever felicitous invention of man, it is generally received that you died in battle. I hope your majesty is well,” added Kisloch, bowing to Schirene.

“You are very welcome, friends,” replied Alroy; “I know your worth. You have seen, as you say, the best and the worst, and will, I trust, see better. Died in battle, eh!—that’s good!”

“’Tis so received,” said Calidas.

“And what news of our friends?”

“Not over good, but strange.”

“How so?”

“Hamadan is taken.”

“I am prepared; tell me all.”

“Old Bostenay and the Lady Miriam are borne prisoners to Bagdad.”

“Prisoners!”

“But so: all will be well with them, I trow.—The Lord Honain is in high favour with the conqueror, and will doubtless protect them.”

“Honain in favour?”

“Even so. He made terms for the city, and right good ones.”

“Hah! he was ever dextrous. Well! if he save my sister, I care not for his favour.”

“There is no doubt. All may yet be well, sir.”

with lo
m a a a
a

“ Let us act, not hope. Where’s Abner ?”

“ Dead.”

“ How ?”

“ In battle.”

“ Art sure ?”

“ I saw him fall, and fought beside him.”

“ A soldier’s death is all our fortune now. I am glad he was not captured. Where’s Medad, Ithamar ?”

“ Fled into Egypt.”

“ We have no force whatever then ?”

“ None but your guards here.”

“ They are strong enough to plunder a caravan. Honain, you say, in favour ?”

“ Very high. He’ll make good terms for us.”

“ This is strange news.”

“ Very, but true.”

“ Well ! you are welcome ! Share our fare ; ’tis rough, and somewhat scanty ; but we have feasted, and may feast again. Fled into Egypt, eh ?”

“ Ay ! sir.”

“ Schirene, shouldst like to see the Nile ?”

“ I have heard of crocodiles.”

XIV.

If the presence of Kisloch and his companions were not very pleasing to Alroy, with the rest of the band they soon became great favourites. Their local knowledge, and their experience of desert life, made them valuable allies, and their boisterous jocularities and unceasing merriment were not unwelcome in the present monotonous existence of the fugitives. As for Alroy himself, he meditated an escape to Egypt. He determined to seize the first opportunity of procuring some camels, and then dispersing his band, with the exception of Benaiah and a few faithful retainers, he trusted that, disguised as merchants, they might succeed in crossing Syria, and entering Africa by Palestine. With these plans and prospects, he became each day more cheerful, and more sanguine as to the future. He had in his possession some very valuable jewels, which he anticipated parting with at Cairo for a sum sufficient for all his purposes, and having exhausted all the passions of life while yet a youth, he looked forward to the tranquil termination of his existence in some poetic solitude with his beautiful companion.

One evening as they returned from the oasis, Alroy guiding the camel that bore Schirene, and ever and anon looking up in her inspiring face, her sanguine spirit would have indulged in a delightful future.

"Thus shall we pass the desert, sweet," said Schirene. "Can this be toil?"

"There is no toil with love," replied Alroy.

"And we were made for love, and not for empire," rejoined Schirene.

"The past is a dream," said Alroy. "So sages teach us; but until we act, their wisdom is but wind. I feel it now. Have we ever lived in aught but deserts, and fed on aught but dates? Methinks 'tis very natural. But that I am tempted by the security of distant lands, I could remain here, a free and happy outlaw. Time, custom and necessity form our natures. When I first met Scherirah in these ruins, I shrank with horror from degraded man; and now I sigh to be his heir. We must not think!"

“No, love, we ’ll only hope,” replied Schirene; and they passed through the gates.

The night was beautiful, the air was still warm, and sweet. Schirene gazed upon the luminous heavens. “We thought not of these skies when we were at Bagdad,” she exclaimed; “and yet, my life, what was the brightness of our palaces compared to these? All is left to us that man should covet, freedom, beauty and youth. I do believe, ere long, Alroy, we shall look back upon the wondrous past, as on another and a lower world. Would this were Egypt! ’Tis my only wish.”

“And it shall soon be gratified. All will soon be arranged. A few brief days, and then Schirene will mount her camel for a longer ride than just to gather dates. You ’ll make a sorry traveller, I fear!”

“Not I; I ’ll tire ye all.”

They reached the circus, and seated themselves round the blazing fire. Seldom had Alroy, since his fall, appeared more cheerful. Schirene sang an Arab air to the band, who joined in joyous chorus. It was late ere they sought repose; and they retired to their rest sanguine and contented.

A few hours after, at the break of dawn, Alroy was roused from his slumbers by a rude pressure on his breast. He started; a ferocious soldier was kneeling over him; he would have spurned him; he found his hand manacled. He would have risen, his feet were bound. He looked round for Schirene, and called her name; he was answered only by a shriek. The amphitheatre was filled with Karasmian troops. His own men were surprised and overpowered. Kisloch and the Guebre had been on guard. He was raised from the ground, and flung upon a camel, which was instantly trotted out of the circus. On every side he beheld a wild scene of disorder and dismay. He was speechless from passion and despair. The camel was dragged into the desert. A body of cavalry instantly surrounded it, and they set off at a rapid pace. The whole seemed the work of an instant.

How many days had passed Alroy knew not. He had taken no count of time. Night and day were to him the same. He was in a stupor. But the sweetness of the air, and the greenness of the earth, at length partially roused his attention. He was just conscious that they had quitted the desert. Before him was a noble river; he beheld the Euphrates from the very spot he had first viewed it in his pilgrimage. The strong association of ideas called back his memory. A tear stole down his cheek; the bitter drop stole to his parched lips; he asked the nearest horseman for water. The guard gave him a wetted sponge, with which, with difficulty, he contrived to wipe his lips, and then he let it fall to the ground. The Karasmian struck him.

They arrived at the river. The prisoner was taken from the camel and placed in a covered boat. After some hours, they stopped and disembarked at a small village. Alroy was placed upon a donkey with his back to its head. His clothes were soiled and tattered. The children pelted him with mud. An old woman, with a fanatic curse, placed a crown of paper on his brow. With difficulty his brutal guards prevented their victim from being torn to pieces. And in such fashion, towards noon of the fourteenth day, David Alroy again entered Bagdad.

XV.

The intelligence of the capture of Alroy spread through the agitated city. The Moolahs bustled about as if they had received a fresh demonstration of the authenticity of the prophetic mission. All the Dervishes began begging. The men discussed affairs in the coffee-houses, and the women chatted at the fountains(13).

"They may say what they like, but I wish him well," said a fair Arab, as she arranged her veil. "He may be an impostor, but he was a very handsome one."

"All the women are for him, that's the truth," responded a companion; "but then we can do him no good."

"We can tear their eyes out," said a third.

"And what do you think of Alp Arslan, truly?" inquired a fourth.

"I wish he were a pitcher, and then I could break his neck," said a fifth.

"Only think of the princess!" said a sixth.

"Well! she has had a glorious time of it," said a seventh.

"Nothing was too good for her," said an eighth.

"I like true love," said a ninth.

"Well! I hope he will be too much for them all yet," said a tenth.

"I should not wonder," said an eleventh.

"He can't," said a twelfth, "he has lost his sceptre."

"You don't say so," said a thirteenth.

"It is too true," said a fourteenth.

"Do you think he was a wizard?" said a fifteenth

“I vow if there be not a fellow looking at us behind those trees.”

“Impudent scoundrel !” said a sixteenth. “I wish it were Alroy. Let us all scream, and put down our veils.”

And the group ran away.

XVI.

Two stout soldiers were playing chess(14) in a coffee-house.

“May I slay my mother,” said one, “but I cannot make a move. I fought under him at Nehaund ; and though I took the amnesty, I have half a mind now to seize my sword and stab the first Turk that enters.”

“’Twere but sheer justice,” said his companion. “By my father’s blessing, he was the man for a charge. They may say what they like, but compared with him, Alp Arslan is a white-livered giaour.”

“Here is confusion to him and to thy last move. There’s the dirhem, I can play no more. May I slay my mother, though, but I did not think he would have let himself be taken.”

“By the blessing of my father, nor I ; but then he was asleep.”

“That makes a difference. He was betrayed.”

“All brave men are. They say Kisloch and his set pocket their fifty thousand by the job.”

“May each dirhem prove a plague spot!”

“Amen! Dost remember Abner?”

“May I slay my mother if I ever forget him. He spoke to his men like so many lambs. What’s become of the Lady Miriam?”

“She is here.”

“That will cut Alroy.”

“He was ever fond of her. Dost remember she gained Adoram’s life?”

“Oh! she could do anything—next to the queen.”

“Before her, I say before her. He has refused the queen, he never refused the Lady Miriam.”

“Because she asked less.”

“Dost know it seemed to me that things never went on so well after Jabaster’s death?”

“So say I. There was a something, eh?”

“A sort of a peculiar, as it were, kind of something, eh?”

“You have well described it. Every man felt the same. I have often mentioned it to my comrades. Say what you like, said I, but slay my mother, if ever since the old gentleman strangled himself things don’t seem, as it were, in their natural propinquity. ’Twas the phrase I used.”

“A very choice one. Unless there’s a natural propinquity, the best arranged matters will fall out. However, the ass sees farther than his rider, and so it was with Alroy, the best commander I ever served under, all the same.”

“Let’s go forth and see how affairs run.”

“Ay, do. If we hear any one abuse Alroy, we’ll cleave his skull.”

“That will we. There are a good many of our stout fellows about; we might do something yet.”

“Who knows.”

XVII.

A subterranean dungeon of the citadel of Bagdad held in its gloomy limits the late lord of Asia.

The captive did not sigh, or weep, or wail. He did not speak. He did not even think. For several days he remained in a state of stupor. On the morning of the fourth day, he almost unconsciously partook of the wretched provision which his gaolers brought him. Their torches, round which the bats whirled and flapped their wings, and twinkled their small eyes, threw a ghastly glare over the nearer walls of the dungeon, the extremity of which defied the vision of the prisoner; and when the gaolers retired, Alroy was in complete darkness.

The image of the past came back to him. He tried in vain to penetrate the surrounding gloom. His hands were manacled, his legs also were loaded with chains. The notion that his life might perhaps have been cruelly spared in order that it might linger on in this horrible state of conscious annihilation, filled him with frenzy. He would have dashed his fetters against his brow, but the chain restrained him. He flung himself upon the damp and rigid ground. His fall disturbed a thousand obscene things. He heard the quick glide of a serpent, the creeping retreat of the clustering scorpions, and the swift escape of the dashing rats. His mighty calamities seemed slight, when compared with these petty miseries. His great soul could not support him under these noisome and degrading incidents. He sprang, in disgust, upon his feet, and stood fearful of moving, lest every step should introduce him to some new abomination. At length, exhausted nature was unable any longer to sustain him. He groped his way to the rude seat, cut in the rocky wall, which was his only accommodation. He put forth his hand. It touched the slimy fur of some wild animal, that instantly sprang away, its fiery eyes sparkling in the dark. Alroy recoiled with a sensation of wo-begone dismay. His shaken nerves could not sustain him under this base danger, and these foul and novel trials. He could not refrain from an exclamation of despair; and when he remembered that he was now far beyond the reach of all human solace and sympathy, even all human aid, for a moment his mind seemed to desert him; and he wrung his hands in forlorn and almost idiotic wo.

An awful thing it is—the failing energies of a master-mind. He who places implicit confidence in his genius, will find himself some day utterly defeated and deserted. 'Tis bitter! Every paltry hind seems but to breathe to mock you. Slow, indeed, is such a mind to credit that the never-failing resource can at last be wanting. But so it is. Like a dried-up fountain, the perennial flow and bright fertility have ceased, and ceased for ever. Then comes the madness of retrospection.

Draw a curtain! draw a curtain! and fling it over this agonizing anatomy—I can no more.

The days of childhood, his sweet sister's voice and smiling love, their innocent pastimes, and the kind solicitude of faithful servants, all the soft detail of mild domestic life,—these were the sights and memories that flitted in wild play before the burning vision of Alroy, and rose upon his tortured mind. Empire and glory, his sacred nation, his imperial bride,—these, these were nothing.—Their worth had vanished with the creative soul that called them into action. The pure sympathies of nature alone remained, and all his thought and grief, all his intelligence, all his emotion, were centred in his sister.

It was the seventh morning. A guard entered at an unaccustomed hour, and, sticking a torch into a niche in the wall, announced that a person was without who had permission to speak to the prisoner. They were the first human accents that had met the ear of Alroy during his captivity, which seemed to him an age, a long dark period, that cancelled all things. He shuddered at the harsh tones. He tried to answer, but his unaccustomed lips refused their office. He raised his heavy arms, and endeavoured to signify his consciousness of what had been uttered. Yet, indeed, he had not listened to the message without emotion. He looked forward to the grate with strange curiosity; and as he looked, he trembled. The visitor entered, muffled in a dark caftan. The guard disappeared; and the caftan falling to the ground, revealed Honain.

“My beloved Alroy,” said the brother of Jabaster; and he advanced, and pressed him to his bosom. Had it been Miriam, Alroy might have at once expired; but the presence of this worldly man called back his worldliness. The revulsion of his feelings was wonderful. Pride, perhaps even hope, came to his aid; all the associations seemed to counsel exertion; for a moment he seemed the same Alroy.

“I rejoice to find at least thee safe, Honain.”

“I also, if my security may lead to thine.”

“Still whispering hope!”

“Despair is the conclusion of fools.”

“O Honain! ’tis a great trial. I can play my part, and yet methinks ’twere better we had not again met. How is Schirene?”

“Thinking of thee.”

“’Tis something that she can think. My mind has gone. Where’s Miriam?”

“Free.”

“That’s something. Thou hast done that.— Good, good Honain, be kind to that sweet child, if only for my sake. Thou art all she has left.”

“ She hath thee.”

“ Her desolation.”

“ Live, and be her refuge.”

“ How’s that ? These walls—escape ? No, no ; it is impossible.”

“ I do not deem it so.”

“ Indeed ! I’ll do any thing. Speak ! speak ! Can we bribe ? can we cleave their skulls ? can we——”

“ Calm thyself, my friend. There is no need of bribes, no need of bloodshed. We must make terms.”

“ Terms ! We might have made those upon the plains of Nehauend. Terms ! Terms with a captive victim ?”

“ Why victim ?”

“ Is Arslan then so generous ?”

“ He is a beast, more savage than the boar that grinds its tusks within his country’s forests.”

“ Why speakest thou then of hope ?”

“ I spoke of certainty. I did not mention hope.”

“ Dear Honain, my brain is weak ; but I can bear strange things, or else I’d not be here. I feel thy thoughtful friendship ; but indeed there needs no winding words to tell my fate. Pr’ythee, speak out.”

“ In a word, thy life is safe.”

“ What, spared !”

“ If it please thee.”

“ Please me ! Life is sweet. I feel its sweetness. I want but little. Freedom and solitude are all I ask. My life spared ! I’ll not believe it. Thou hast done this deed, thou mighty man, that masterest all souls. Thou hast not forgotten me, thou hast not forgotten the days gone by, thou hast not forgotten thine own Alroy ! Who calls thee worldly, is a slanderer. Oh, Honain ! thou art too faithful !”

"I have no thought, but for thy service, prince."

"Call me not prince, call me thine own Alroy. My life spared! 'Tis wonderful! When may I go? Let no one see me. Manage that, Honain. Thou canst manage all things. I'm for Egypt.—Thou hast been to Egypt, hast thou not, Honain?"

"A very wondrous land, 'twill please thee much."

"When may I go? Tell me when I may go. When may I quit this dark and noisome cell?—'Tis worse than all their tortures, dear Honain. Air and light, and I really think my spirit never would break, but this horrible dungeon—I scarce can look upon thy face, sweet friend. 'Tis serious."

"Wouldst thou have me gay?"

"Yes! if we are free."

"Alroy! thou art a great spirit, the greatest that e'er I knew, or ever I have read of. I never knew thy like, and never shall."

"Tush, tush, sweet friend, I am a broken reed, but still I am free. This is no time for courtly phrases. Let's go, and go at once."

"A moment, dear Alroy. I am no flatterer. What I said came from my heart, and doth concern us much and instantly. I was saying thou hast no common mind, Alroy—indeed thou hast a mind unlike all others. Listen, my prince.—Thou hast read mankind deeply and truly. Few have seen more than thyself, and none have so rare a spring of that intuitive knowledge of thy race, which is a gem to which experience is but a jeweller, and without which no action can befriend us."

"Well, well!"

"A moment's calmness. Thou hast entered Bagdad in triumph, and thou hast entered the same city with every contumely the base spirit of our race could cast upon its victim. 'Twas a great lesson."

“ I feel it so.”

“ And teaches us how vile and valueless is the opinion of our fellow men.”

“ Alas ! ’tis true.”

“ I am glad to see thee in this wholesome temper. ’Tis full of wisdom.”

“ The miserable are often wise.”

“ But to believe is nothing unless we act. Speculation should only sharpen practice. The time hath come to prove thy lusty faith in this philosophy. I told thee we could make terms. I have made them. To-morrow it was doomed Alroy should die, and what a death ! A death of infinite torture ! Hast ever seen a man impaled”(15)?

“ Hah !”

“ To view it is alone a doom.”

“ God of heaven !”

“ It is so horrible, that ’tis ever marked, that when this direful ceremony occurs, the average deaths in cities greatly increase. ’Tis from the turning of the blood in the spectators, who yet from some ungovernable madness can ne’er refrain from hurrying to the scene. I speak with some authority—I speak as a physician.”

“ Speak no more. I cannot endure it.”

“ To-morrow this doom awaited thee. As for Schirene——”

“ Not for her, oh ! surely not for her !”

“ No, they were merciful. She is a caliph’s daughter. ’Tis not forgotten. The axe would close her life. Her fair neck would give slight trouble to the headsman’s art. But for thy sister, but for Miriam—she is a witch, a Jewish witch ! They would have burnt her alive.”

“ I’ll not believe it, no, no, I’ll not believe it : damnable, bloody demons ! When I had power I spared all—all but—ah, me ! ah, me ! why did I live !”

VOL. II.—I

“Thou dost forget thyself ; I speak of that which was to have been, not of that which is to be. I have stepped in and communed with the conqueror. I have made terms.”

“What are they—what can they be ?”

“Easy. To a philosopher like Alroy an idle ceremony.”

“Be brief, be brief.”

“Thou seest thy career is a great scandal to the Moslemin. I mark their weakness, and I have worked upon it. Thy mere defeat or death will not blot out the stain upon their standard and their faith. The public mind is wild with fantasies since Alroy rose. Men’s opinions flit to and fro with that fearful change that bodes no stable settlement of states. None know what to cling to, or where to place their trust. Creeds are doubted—authority disputed. They would gladly account for thy success by other than human means, yet must deny thy mission. There also is the fame of a fair and mighty princess, a daughter of their caliphs, which they would gladly clear. I mark all this, observe, and work upon it. So, could we devise some means by which thy lingering followers could be for ever silenced, this great scandal fairly erased, and the public frame brought to a sounder and more tranquil pulse, why they would concede much, much, very much.”

“Thy meaning, not thy means, are evident.”

“They are in thy power.”

“In mine ? ’Tis a deep riddle. Pr’ythee solve it.”

“Thou wilt be summoned at to-morrow’s noon before this Arslan. There, in the presence of the assembled people, who are now with him as much as they were with thee, thou wilt be accused of magic, and of intercourse with the infernal powers. Plead guilty."

"Well! is there more?"

"Some trifle. They will then examine thee about the princess. It is not difficult to confess that Alroy won the caliph's daughter by an irresistible spell—and now 'tis broken."

"So, so. Is that all?"

"The chief. Thou canst then address some phrases to the Hebrew prisoners, denying thy divine mission, and so forth—to settle the public mind, observe, upon this point for ever."

"Ay, ay, and then——?"

"No more, except for form, (upon the completion of the conditions, mind, you will be conveyed to what land you please, with such amount of treasure as you choose), there is no more, except, I say, for form, I would, if I were you, ('twill be expected), I would just publicly affect to renounce our faith, and bow before their prophet."

"Hah! Art thou there? Is this thy freedom? Get thee behind me, tempter!"

"Never, never, never! not a jot, not a jot: I'll not yield a jot. Were my doom one everlasting torture, I'd spurn thy terms! Is this thy high contempt of our poor kind—to outrage my God! to prove myself the vilest of the vile, and baser than the basest! Rare philosophy! O Honain! would we had never met!"

"Or never parted. True. Had my word been taken, Alroy would ne'er have been betrayed."

"No more, no more; I pray thee, sir, no more. Leave me."

"Were this a palace, I would. Harsh words are softened by a friendly ear, when spoken in affliction."

"Say what they will, I am the Lord's anointed. As such I should have lived, as such at least I'll die."

"And Miriam?"

"The Lord will not desert her: she ne'er deserted him."

"Schirene?"

"Schirene! why! for her sake alone I'll die a hero! Shall it be said she loved a craven slave, a base impostor, a vile renegade, a villainous dealer in drugs and charms? Oh! no, no, no! if only for her sake, her sweet, sweet sake, my end shall be like my great life. As the sun I rose, like him I set. Still the world is warm with my bright fame, and my last hour shall not disgrace my noon, stormy indeed, but glorious!"

Honain took the torch from the niche, and advanced to the grate. It was not fastened: he drew it gently open, and led forward a veiled and female figure. The veiled and female figure threw herself at the feet of Alroy, who seemed lost to what was passing. A soft lip pressed his hand. He started, his chains clanked.

"Alroy!" softly murmured the kneeling female.

"What voice is that?" wildly exclaimed the prince of the captivity. "It falls upon my ear like long forgotten music. I'll not believe it. No! I'll not believe it. Art thou Schirene?"

"I am that wretched thing they called thy bride."

"Oh! this indeed is torture! What impalement can equal this sharp moment? Look not on me, let not our eyes meet! They have met before, like to the confluence of two shining rivers blending in one great stream of rushing light. Bear off that torch, sir. Let impenetrable darkness cover our darker fortunes."

“Alroy!”

“She speaks again. Is she mad, as I am, that thus she plays with agony?”

“Sire,” said Honain, advancing, and laying his hand gently on the arm of the captive, “I pray thee moderate this passion. Thou hast some faithful friends here, who would fain commune in calmness for thy lasting welfare.”

“Welfare! He mocks me.”

“I beseech thee, sire, be calm. If, indeed, I speak unto that great Alroy that all men feared and still may fear, I pray remember, 'tis not in palaces, or in the battle field alone, the heroic soul can conquer and command. Scenes like these are the great proof of a superior soul. While we live, our body is a temple where our genius pours forth its godlike inspiration, and while the altar is not overthrown, the deity may still work marvels. Then rouse thyself, great sire; bethink thee, a caliph or a captive, there is no man within this breathing world like to Alroy. Shall such a being fall without a struggle, like some poor felon, who has nought to trust to but the dull shuffling accidents of chance? I too am a prophet, and I feel thou still wilt conquer.”

“Give me my sceptre then, give me the sceptre! I speak to the wrong brother. It was not thou—it was not thou that gave it me.”

“Gain it once more. The Lord deserted David for a time, yet still he pardoned him, and still he died a king.”

“A woman worked his fall.”

“But thee a woman raises. This great princess, has she not suffered too? Yet her spirit is still unbroken. List to her counsel: it is deep and fond.”

“So was our love.”

“And is, my Alroy!” exclaimed the princess.

“Be calm, be calm, I pray thee! For my sake be calm; I am calm for thine. Thou hast listened to all Honain has told thee; that wise man, my Alroy, that never erred. ’Tis but a word he counsels, an empty word, a most unmeaning form. But speak it, and thou art free, and Alroy and Schirene may blend again their glorious careers, and lives of sweet fruition. Dost thou not remember when walking in the garden of our joy, and palled with empire, how often hast thou sighed for some sweet isle unknown to man, where thou mightest pass thy days with no companion but my faithful self, and no adventures but our constant loves? Oh! my beloved, that life may still be thine! And dost thou falter? Dost call thyself forlorn with such fidelity, and deem thyself a wretch, when paradise with all its beauteous gates but woo thy entrance? Oh! no, no, no! thou hast forgot Schirene: I fear me much, thy over-fond Schirene, who doats upon thy image in thy chains more than she did when those sweet hands of thine were bound with gems, and played with her bright locks!”

“She speaks of another world. I do remember something. Who has sent this music to a dungeon? My spirit softens with her melting words. My eyes are moist. I weep! ’Tis pleasant. Sorrow is joy compared with my despair. I never thought to shed a tear again. My brain methinks is cooler.”

“Weep, weep, I pray thee weep; but let me kiss away thy tears, my soul! Didst think thy Schirene had deserted thee? Ah! that was it that made my bird so sad. It shall be free, and fly in a sweet sky, and feed on flowers with its faithful mate. Ah me! I am once more happy with my boy. There was no misery but thy absence, sweet! Methinks this dungeon is our bright kiosk! Is that the sunbeam, or thy smile, my love, that makes the walls so joyful!"

"Did I smile?—I 'll not believe it."

"Indeed you did. Ah! see he smiles again. Why this is freedom! There is no such thing as sorrow. 'Tis a lie to frighten fools!"

"Why, Honain, what 's this? 'Twould seem I am really joyful. There 's inspiration in her very breath. I am another being. Nay! waste not kisses on those ugly fetters."

"Methinks they are gold."

They were silent. Schirene drew Alroy to his rough seat, and gently placing herself on his knees, threw her arms round his neck, and buried her face in his breast. After a few minutes she raised her head, and whispered in his ear in irresistible accents of sweet exultation, "We shall be free to-morrow!"

"To-morrow! is the trial so near?" exclaimed the captive with an agitated voice and changing countenance. "To-morrow!" He threw Schirene aside somewhat hastily, and sprang from his seat. "To-morrow! would it were over! To-morrow! Methinks there is within that single word the fate of ages! Shall it be said to-morrow Alroy——"

"Hah! what art thou that risest now before me? Dread, mighty spirit, thou hast come in time to save my last perdition. Take me to thy bosom, 'tis not stabbed. They did not stab thee. Thou seest me here communing with thy murderers. What then? I am innocent. Ask them, dread ghost, and call upon their fiendish souls to say I am pure. They would make me dark as themselves, but shall not."

"Honain, Honain! exclaimed the princess in a terrible whisper, as she flew to the physician. "He is wild again, he is wild. Calm him, calm him. Mark ! how he stands with his extended arms, and fixed and vacant eyes, muttering most awful words! My spirit fails me. It is too fearful."

The physician advanced and stood by the side of Alroy, but in vain attempted to catch his attention. He ventured to touch his arm. The prince started, turned round, and recognizing him, exclaimed in a shrieking voice, "Off, fratricide!"

Honain recoiled pale and quivering. Schirene sprang to his arm. "What said he, Honain? Thou dost not speak. I never saw thee pale before. Art thou too mad?"

"Would I were!"

"All men are growing wild. I am sure he said something. I pray thee tell me. What was it?"

"Ask him."

"I dare not. Tell me—tell me, Honain!"

"That I dare not."

"Was it a word?"

"Ay! a word to wake the dead. Let us be gone."

"Without our end? Coward! I'll speak to him. My own Alroy," sweetly whispered the princess, as she advanced before him.

"What has the fox left the tigress! Is't so, eh, eh? Are there no judgments? Are the innocent only haunted? I am innocent; I did not strangle thee! He said rightly, Beware, beware! they who did this, may do even fouler deeds. And here they are quick at their damned work. Thy body suffered, great Jabaster, but me they would strangle body and soul!"

The princess shrieked, and fell into the arms of the advancing Honain, who bore her out of the dungeon.

XVIII.

After the fall of Hamadan, Bostenay and Miriam had been carried prisoners to Bagdad. Through the interference of Honain, their imprisonment had been exempted from the usual hardships; but they were still confined to their chambers in the citadel. Hitherto all the endeavours of Miriam to visit her brother had been fruitless. Honain was the only person to whom she could apply for assistance, and he, in answer to her importunities, only regretted his want of power to aid her. In vain had she attempted, by the offer of some remaining jewels, to secure the co-operation of her guards, with whom her loveliness and the softness of her manners had already ingratiated her. She had not succeeded even in communicating with Alroy. But after the unsuccessful mission of Honain to the dungeon, the late vizier visited the master of the captive, and breaking to her with delicate skill, the intelligence of the impending catastrophe, he announced that he had at length succeeded in obtaining for her the desired permission to visit her brother, and while she shuddered at the proximity of an event for which she had long attempted to prepare herself, Honain, with some modifications, whispered the means by which she flattered herself it might yet be averted. Miriam listened to him in silence, nor could he with all his consummate art succeed in extracting from her the slightest indication of her own opinion as to their expediency. They parted, Honain as sanguine as the wicked ever are.

As Miriam dreaded, both for herself and for Al-roy, the shock of an unexpected meeting, she availed herself of the influence of Honain to send Caleb to her brother, to prepare him for her presence, and to consult him as to the desirable moment. Caleb found his late master lying exhausted on the floor of his dungeon. At first he would not speak, or even raise his head, nor did he for a long time apparently recognize the faithful retainer of his uncle. But at length he grew milder, and when he fully comprehended who the messenger was, and the object of the mission, he at first seemed altogether disinclined to see his sister, but in the end, postponed their meeting for the present, and, pleading great exhaustion, fixed for that sad union, the first hour of dawn.

The venerable Bostenay had scarcely ever spoken since the fall of his nephew: indeed it was but too evident that his faculties, even if they had not entirely deserted him, were at least greatly impaired. He never quitted his couch, he took no notice of what occurred. He evinced no curiosity, scarcely any feeling. If indeed he occasionally did mutter an observation, it was generally of an irritable character, nor truly did he appear satisfied if any one approached him, save Miriam, from whom alone he would accept the scanty victuals which he ever appeared disinclined to touch. But his devoted niece, amid all her harrowing affliction, could ever spare to the protector of her youth a placid countenance, a watchful eye, a gentle voice, and a ready hand. Her religion and her virtue, the strength of her faith, and the inspiration of her innocence, supported this pure and hapless lady amid all her undeserved and unparalleled sorrows.

It was long past midnight, the young widow of Abner reposed upon a couch in a soft slumber. The amiable Beruna, and the beautiful Bathsheba,

The blinds withdrawn, watched the progress of the night. "Shall I wake her?" said the beautiful Bathsheba. "Methinks the stars are paler! She bid me rouse her long before the dawn."

"Her sleep is too beautiful! Let us not wake her," replied the amiable Beruna. "We rouse her only to sorrow."

"May her dreams at least be happy," rejoined the beautiful Bathsheba. "She sleeps tranquilly, as a flower."

"The veil has fallen from her head," said the amiable Beruna. "I will replace it lightly on her brow. Is that well, my Bathsheba?"

"It is well, sweet Beruna. Her face shrouded by the shawl is like a pearl in its shell. See! she moves!"

"Bathsheba?"

"I am here, sweet lady."

"Is it near dawn?"

"Not yet, sweet lady; it is yet night. It is long past the noon of night, sweet lady; methinks I scent the rising breath of morn; but still 'tis night, and the young moon shines like a sickle in the heavenly field, amid the starry harvest."

"Beruna, gentle girl, give me thy arm. I'll rise."

The maidens advanced, and gently raising their mistress, supported her to the window.

"Since our calamities," said Miriam, "I have never proved such tranquil slumber. My dreams were slight but soothing. I saw him, but he smiled. Have I slept long, sweet girls? Give me a kiss. Ye are very watchful."

"Dear lady, let me bring thy shawl. The air is fresh—"

"But sweet; I thank thee, no. My brow is not so cool it needs a covering. 'Tis a fair night!"

Miriam gazed upon the wide prospect of moonlit capital. The eminent position of citadel afforded an extensive view of the mighty groups of buildings, each in itself a city, broken by some vast and hooded cupola, the tall, white minarets of the mosques, or the black spiral form of some lonely cypress, and through which the rushing Tigris, flooded with light, poured forth its broad and brilliant torrent. All was still; not a single boat floated on the fleet river, not a tarry voice broke the stillness of slumbering lions. She gazed, and as she gazed, she could refrain from contrasting the present scene, which seemed the sepulchre of all the passions of our race, with the unrivalled excitement of that stirring spectacle which Bagdad afforded on the celebration of the marriage of Alroy. How different too, was her position to her present, and how happy! The only sister of a devoted brother, the lord conqueror of Asia, the bride of his most victorious captain, one worthy of all her virtues, and whose youthful valour had encircled her brow with a laurel wreath. For Miriam, exalted station had brought neither cares nor crimes. It had, as it were, rendered her charity universal, and her benevolence omnipotent. She could not accuse herself—blessed woman—she could not accuse herself, even in this searching hour of self-knowledge—she could not accuse herself, with all her meekness, modesty and humility, of having for a moment forgotten her dependence on her God, or her duty to her neighbour.

But when her thoughts recurred to that beloved from whom they were indeed scarcely ever absent, and when she remembered him, and all his virtues, and all the thousand incidents of his youth, his adventures to the world, and known only to her, which were indeed the prescience of his fame, and thought of all his surpassing qualities, and all his sweet affection, his unrivalled glory, and his impending fate, the tears, in silent agony, forced their way down her pale and pensive cheek. She bowed her head upon Bathsheba's shoulder, and sweet Beruna pressed her quivering hand.

The moon set, the stars grew white and ghastly, and, one by one, vanished away. Over the distant plain of the Tigris, the scene of the marriage pomp, the dark purple horizon shivered into a rich streak of white and orange. The solemn strain of the muezzin sounded from the minarets. Some one knocked at the door. It was Caleb.

"I am ready," said Miriam; and for a moment she covered her face with her right hand. "Think of me, sweet maidens; pray for me!"

XIX.

Leaning on Caleb, and lighted by a gaoler, bearing torches, Miriam descended the damp and broken stairs that led to the dungeon. She faltered as she arrived at the gate. She stopped, and leant against the cold and gloomy wall. The gaoler and Caleb preceded her. She heard the voice of Alroy. It was firm and sweet. Its accents re-assured her. Caleb came forth with a torch, and held it to her feet; and as he bent down, he said, "My lord bid me beg you to be of good heart, for he is."

The gaoler having stuck his torch in the niche, withdrew. Miriam desired Caleb to stay without. Then, summoning up all her energies, she entered the dreadful abode. Alroy was standing to receive her. The light fell upon his countenance. It smiled.

Miriam could no longer restrain herself. She ran forward, and pressed him to her heart.

"Oh, my best, my long beloved," whispered Alroy; "such a meeting indeed leads captivity captive!"

But the sister could not speak. She leant her head upon his shoulder, and closed her eyes, that she might not weep.

"Courage, dear heart; courage, courage!" whispered the captive. "Indeed I am very happy!"

"My brother, my brother!"

"Had we met yesterday, you would have found me perhaps a little vexed. But to-day I am myself again. Since I crossed the Tigris, I know not that I have felt such self-content. I have had sweet dreams, dear Miriam, full of solace, and more than dreams. The Lord has pardoned me, I truly think."

"Oh, my brother! your words are full of comfort; for, indeed, I too have dreamed, and dreamed of consolation. My spirit since our fall has never been more tranquil."

"Indeed I am very happy."

"Say so again, my David; let me hear again these words of solace!"

"Indeed, 'tis very true, my faithful friend. It is not spoken in kind mockery to make you joyous. For know, last eve, whether the Lord repented of his wrath, or whether some dreadful trials, of which we will not speak, and wish not to remember, had made atonement for my manifold sins—but so it was, that about the time my angel Miriam sent her soothing message, a feeling of repose came over me, such as I long have coveted. Anon, I fell into a slumber, deep and sweet, and for those wild and whirling images, that of late have darted from my brain when it should rest,—glimpses of empire and conspiracy, snatches of fierce wars and mocking loves,—I stood beside our native fountain's brink, and gathered flowers with my earliest friend. As I placed the fragrant captives in your flowing locks, and kissed you when you smiled, there came Jabaster, that great, injured man, no longer stern and awful, but with benignant looks, and full of love. And he said, 'David, the Lord hath marked thy faithfulness, despite the darkness of thy dungeon.' So he vanished. He spoke, my sister, of some strange temptations by heavenly aid withstood. No more of that. I awoke. And lo! I heard my name still called. Full of my morning dream, I thought it was you, and I answered, 'Dear sister, art thou here?' But no one answered; and then reflecting, my memory recognized those thrilling tones that summoned Alroy in Jabaster's cave."

"The daughter of the Voice?"

"Even that sacred messenger. I am full of faith. The Lord hath pardoned me. Be sure of that."

"I cannot doubt it, David. You have done great things for Israel; no one in these latter days has risen like you. If you have fallen, you were young, and strangely tempted."

"Yet Israel, Israel! Did I not feel a worthier leader awaits my country yet, my heart would crack. I have betrayed my country!"

"Oh no, no, no! You have shown what we can do, and shall. Your memory alone is inspiration. A great career, although balked of its end, is still a land-mark of human energy. Failure, when sublime, is not without its purpose. Great deeds are great legacies, and work with wondrous usury. By what man has done, we learn what man can do; and gauge the power and prospects of our race."

"Alas ! there is no one to guard my name. 'T will be reviled; or worse, 't will be forgotten!"

"Never, never ! the memory of great actions never dies. The sun of glory, though awhile obscured, will shine at last. And so, sweet brother, perchance some poet, in some distant age, within whose veins our sacred blood may flow, his fancy fired with the national theme, may strike his harp to Alroy's wild career, and consecrate a name too long forgotten !"

"May love make thee a prophetess !" exclaimed Alroy, as he bent down his head and embraced her. "Sweetest," he whispered, "do not tarry. 'Tis better we should part in this firm mood."

She sprang from him, she clasped her hands. "We will not part," she exclaimed, with energy; "I will die with thee."

"Blessed girl, be calm, be calm ! Do not unman me."

"I am calm. See ! I do not weep. Not a tear, not a tear. They are all in my heart."

"Go, go, my Miriam, angel of light and loveliness ! Tarry no longer : I pray thee go. I would not think of the past. Let all my mind be centred in the present. Thy presence calls back our by-gone days and softens me too much. My duty to my uncle. Go, dearest, go !"

"And leave thee, leave thee to——oh ! my David, thou hast seen, thou hast heard——Honain?"

"No more, no more ; let not that accursed name profane those holy lips. Raise not the demon in me."

"I am silent, I am silent. Yet, yet 'tis madness, 'tis madness ! Oh ! my brother, thou hast a fearful trial."

"The God of Israel is my refuge. He saved our fathers in the fiery furnace. He will save me."

“I am full of faith. I pray thee let me stay.”

“I would be silent, I would be alone. I cannot speak, Miriam. I ask one favour, the last and dearest, from her who has never had a thought but for my wishes—blessed being, leave me.”

“I go. Oh! Alroy, farewell! Let me kiss you. Again, once more! Let me kneel and bless you. Brother, beloved brother, great and glorious brother, I am worthy of you: I will not weep. I am prouder this dread moment of your love, than all your foes can be of their hard triumph!”

XX.

Beruna and Bathsheba received their mistress when she returned to her chamber. They marked her desolate air. She was silent, pale and cold. They bore her to her couch, whereon she sat with a most listless and unmeaning look, her quivering lips parted, her eyes fixed upon the ground in vacant abstraction, and her arms languidly folded before her. Beruna stole behind her, and supported her back with pillows, and Bathsheba, unnoticed, wiped the slight foam from her mouth. Thus Miriam remained for several hours, her faithful maidens in vain watching for any indication of her self-consciousness.

Suddenly a trumpet sounded.

“What is that?” exclaimed Miriam, in a shrill voice, and looking up with a distracted glance.

Neither of them answered, since they were aware it betokened the going forth of Alroy to his trial.

Miriam remained in the same posture, and with the same expression of wild inquiry. Another trumpet sounded, and after that a shout of the people. Then she raised up her arms to heaven, and bowed her head—and died.

XXI.

“Has the second trumpet sounded?”

“To be sure: run, run for a good place. Where is Abdallah?”

“Selling sherbet in the square. We shall find him. Has Alroy come forth?”

“Yes! he goes the other way. We shall be too late. Only think of Abdallah selling sherbet!”

“Father, let me go?”

“You will be in the way; you are too young; you will see nothing. Little boys should stay at home.”

“No, they should not. I will go. You can put me on your shoulders.”

“Where is Ibrahim? Where is Ali? We must all keep together. We shall have to fight for it. I wish Abdallah were here. Only think of his selling sherbet!”

“Keep straight forward. That is right. It is no use going that way. The bazaar is shut. There is Fakreddin, there is Osman Effendi. He has got a new page.”

“So he has, I declare; and a very pretty boy too.”

“Father, will they impale Alroy alive?”

“I am sure I do not know. Never ask questions, my dear. Little boys never should.”

“Yes they should. Oh my! I hope they will impale him alive. I shall be so disappointed if they do not.”

“ Keep to the left. Dash through the butcher’s bazaar: that is open. All right, all right. Did you push me, sir ?”

“ Suppose I did push you, sir—what then, sir ?”

“ Come along, don’t quarrel. That is a Karasmian. They think they are to do what they like. We are five to one to be sure, but still there is nothing like peace and quiet. I wish Abdallah were here with his stout shoulders. Only think of his selling sherbet!”

XXII.

The square of the grand mosque, the same spot where Jabaster met Abidan by appointment, was the intended scene of the pretended trial of Alroy. Thither by break of day the sight-loving thousands of the capital had repaired. In the centre of the square a large circle was described by a crimson cord, and guarded by Karasmian soldiers ; around this the swelling multitude pressed like the gathering waves of ocean, but whenever the tide set in with too great an impulse, the savage Karasmians appeased the ungovernable element by raising their brutal battle-axes, and breaking the crowns and belabouring the shoulders of their nearest victims. As the morning advanced, the terraces of the surrounding houses, covered with awnings, were crowded with spectators. All Bagdad was about. Since the marriage of Alroy, there had never been such a merry morn as the day of his impalement.

At one end of the circle was erected a magnificent throne. Half-way between the throne and the other end of the circle, but farther back, stood a company of Negro eunuchs, hideous to behold, who, clothed in white and armed with various instruments of torture, surrounded the enormous stakes, tall, thin and sharp, that were prepared for the final ceremony.

The flourish of trumpets, the clash of cymbals, and the wild beat of the tambour, announced the arrival of Alp Arslan from the serail. An avenue to the circle had been preserved through the multitude. The royal procession might be traced as it wound through the populace by the sparkling and undulating line of plumes of honour, and the dazzling forms of the waving streamers, on which were inscribed the names of Allah and the prophet. Suddenly, amid the bursts of music, and the shouts of the spectators, many of whom on the terraces humbled themselves on their knees, Alp Arslan mounted the throne, around which ranged themselves his chief captains, and a deputation of the moollahs, and imams, and cadis, and other principal personages of the city.

The king of Karasmé was very tall in stature, and somewhat meagre in form. He was fair, or rather sandy-coloured, with a red beard, and blue eyes, and a flat nose. The moment he was seated a trumpet was heard in the distance from an opposite quarter, and it was soon understood throughout the assembly that the great captive was about to appear.

A band of Karasmian guards first entered the circle and ranged themselves round the cord with their backs to the spectators. After them came fifty of the principal Hebrew prisoners, with their hands bound behind them, but evidently more for form than security. To these succeeded a small covered wagon drawn by mules, and surrounded by guards, from which was led forth, his legs relieved from their manacles, but his hands still in heavy chains, David Alroy !

An universal buzz of blended sympathy, and wonder, and fear, and triumph, arose throughout the whole assembly. Each man involuntarily stirred. The vast populace moved to and fro in agitation. His garments soiled and tattered, his head bare, and his long locks drawn off his forehead, pale, and very thin, but still unsubdued, the late conqueror and caliph of Bagdad threw around a calm and imperial glance upon those who were but recently his slaves.

The trumpets again sounded, order was called, and a crier announced that his highness Alp Arslan, the mighty sovereign of Karasmé, their lord, protector and king, and avenger of Allah and the prophet, against all rebellious and evil-minded Jews and giaours, was about to speak. There was a deep and universal silence, and then sounded a voice high as the eagle's in a storm.

“David Alroy !” said his conqueror. “You are brought here this day neither for trial nor for judgment. Captured in arms against your rightful sovereign, you are of course prepared, like other rebels, for your doom. Such a crime alone deserves the most avenging punishments. What then do you merit, who are loaded with a thousand infamies, who have blasphemed Allah and the prophet, and by the practice of magic arts, and the aid of the infernal powers, have broken the peace of kingdoms, occasioned infinite bloodshed, outraged all law, religion and decency, misled the minds of your deluded votaries, and especially by a direct compact with Eblis, by the most horrible spells and infamous incantations, captivated the senses of an illustrious princess, heretofore famous for the practice of every virtue, and a descendant of the prophet himself.

“Behold those stakes of palm wood, shafts than a lance! The most terrible retribution human ingenuity has devised for the guilty, avenges you. But your crimes baffle all human vengeance. Look forward for your satisfactory reward to the infernal powers by whose dark co-operation we have occasioned such disasters. Your punishment is public, that all men may know that the guilty never escape, and that, if your heart be visited with the slightest degree of compunction for your numerous victims, you may this day, by the frank confession of the irresistible means by which you seduced them, exonerate your victims from the painful and ignominious end with which, through your influence, they are now threatened. O assembled people, the infinite mercy of the Merciful and Generous of Allah! He allows the wretched man to confess his infamy, and to save, by his confession, his unfortunate victims. I have said it. Glory to Allah!”

And the people shouted, “He has said it, he has said it! Glory to Allah! He is great, he is glorious, and Mahomed is his prophet!”

“Am I to speak?” inquired Alroy, when the tumult had subsided. The melody of his powerful voice commanded universal attention.

Alp Arslan nodded his head in approbation.

“King of Karasmé! I stand here accused of many crimes. Now hear my answers. ’Tis so, I am a rebel. My answer is, I am a prince of noble descent, of a sacred race, and far more ancient. I am fealty to no one but to my God, and if I am broken that, I am yet to learn Alp Arslan is not the avenger of his power. As for thy God and prophet, I know not them, though they acknowlmine. 'Tis well understood in every polity, my people stand apart from other nations, and ever will, despite of suffering. So much for blasphemy ; I am true to a deep faith of ancient days, which even the sacred writings of thy race still reverence. For the arts magical I practised, and the communion with infernal powers 'tis said I held, know, king, I raised the standard of my faith, by the direct commandment of my God, the great Creator of the universe. What need of magic then ? what need of paltering with petty fiends when backed by his omnipotence ? My magic was his inspiration. Need I prove why, with such aid, my people crowded around me ? The time will come from out our ancient seed, a worthier chief shall rise, not to be quelled, even by thee, sir.

“For that unhappy princess of whom something was said, with no great mercy as it seemed to me, that lady is my wife, my willing wife, the daughter of a caliph—still my wife, although your stakes may make her soon a widow. I stand not here to account for female fancies. Believe me, sire, she gave her beauty to my raptured arms with no persuasions but such as became a soldier and a king. It may seem strange to thee upon thy throne, the flower of Asia should be plucked by one so vile as I am, sir. Remember, the accidents of fortune are most strange. I was not always what I am. We have met before. There was a day, and that too not long since, when, but for the treachery of some knaves I mark there, fortune seemed half inclined to reverse our fates. Had I conquered, I trust I should have shown more mercy.”

The king of Karasmé was the most passionate of men. He had made a speech according to the advice and instructions of his counsellors, who had assured him, that the tone he adopted would induce Alroy to confess all that he required, and espec to vindicate the reputation of the princess Schir who had already contrived to persuade Alp A that she was the most injured of her sex. king of Karasmé stamped thrice on the platfor his throne, and exclaimed with great fire, ‘ my beard, ye have deceived me ; the dog has fessed nothing !’”

All the counsellors and chief captains, and moollahs, and the imams, and the cadis, and principal personages of the city, were in great sternation. They immediately consulted together and after much disputation, agreed that before proceeded to extremities it was expedient to p what the prisoner would not confess. A venerable scheik, clothed in flowing robes of g with a long white beard, and a turban like the er of Babel, then rose. His sacred reput procured silence while he himself delivered a prayer, supplicating Allah and the prophet to found all blaspheming Jews and giaours, ar pour forth words of truth from the mouths of gious men. And then the venerable scheik moned all witnesses against David Alroy. L diately advanced Kisloch the Kour, who t placed in an eminent position, the cadis of Ba drew forth a scroll from his velvet bag, and to him a deposition wherein the worthy Kis stated, that he first became acquainted with prisoner, David Alroy, in some ruins in the sert ; the haunt of banditti, of whom Alroy the chief ; that he, Kisloch, was a reputable chant, and that his caravan had been plundere these robbers, and he himself captured : tha the second night of his imprisonment, Alroy peared to him in the likeness of a lion, and or third, of a bull with fiery eyes : that he was in habit of constantly transforming himself ; that he frequently raised spirits ; that at length, on one terrible night, Eblis himself came in great procession, and presented Alroy with the sceptre of Solomon Ben Daoud ; and that the next day Alroy raised his standard, and soon after massacred Hassan Subah and his Seljuks, by the visible aid of many terrible demons.

Calidas the Indian, the Guebre, and the Negro, and a few congenial spirits, were not eclipsed in the satisfactory character of their evidence by the luminous testimony of Kisloch the Kourid. The irresistible career of the Hebrew conqueror was undeniably accounted for, and the honour of the Moslemin arms, and the purity of the Moslemin faith, were established in their pristine glory, and all their unsullied reputation. David Alroy was proved to be a child of Eblis, a sorcerer, and a dealer in charms and magical poisons. The people listened with horror and with indignation. They would have burst through the guards and have torn him to pieces, had not they been afraid of the Karasmian battle-axes. So they consoled themselves with the prospect of his approaching tortures.

The cadî of Bagdad bowed himself before the king of Karasmé, and whispered at a respectful distance in the royal ear. The trumpets sounded, the criers enjoined silence, and the royal lips again moved.

“Hear, oh ! ye people, and be wise. The chief cadî is about to read the deposition of the royal princess Schirene, chief victim of the sorcerer.”

And the deposition was read, which stated that David Alroy possessed, and wore next to his heart, a talisman, given him by Eblis, of which the virtue was so great, that if once it were pressed to the heart of any woman, she was no longer mistress of her will. Such had been the unhappy fate of the daughter of the commander of the faithful.

“Is it so written?” inquired the captive.

“It is so written,” replied the cadi, “and bears the imperial signature of the princess.”

“It is a forgery.”

The king of Karasmé started from his throne, and in his rage nearly descended its steps. His face was like scarlet, his beard like a flame. A favourite minister ventured gently to restrain the royal robe.

“Kill the dog on the spot,” muttered the king of Karasmé.

“The princess is herself here,” said the cadi, “to bear witness to the spells of which she was a victim, but from which, by the power of Allah and the prophet, she is now released.”

Alroy started!

“Advance, royal princess,” said the cadi, “and if the deposition thou hast heard be indeed true, condescend to hold up the imperial hand that adorned it with thy signature.”

A band of eunuchs near the throne gave way, a female figure veiled to her feet appeared. She held up her hand amid the breathless agitation of the whole assembly; the ranks of the eunuchs again closed; a loud shriek was heard, and the veiled figure disappeared.

“I am ready for thy tortures, king,” said Alroy, in a tone of deep depression. His firmness appeared to have deserted him. His eyes were cast upon the ground. Apparently he was buried in profound thought, or had delivered himself up to despair.

“Prepare the stakes,” said Alp Arslan.

An involuntary, but universal shudder might be distinguished through the whole assembly.

A slave advanced and offered Alroy a scroll. He recognized the Nubian who belonged to Hoinain. His former minister informed him that he was at hand, that the terms he offered in the dungeon might even yet be granted, that if Alroy would, as he doubted not, as he entreated him, accept them, he was to place the scroll in his bosom, but that if he were still inexorable, still madly determined on a horrible and ignominious end, he was to tear the scroll, and throw it into the arena. Instantly Alroy took the scroll, and with great energy tore it into a thousand pieces. A puff of wind carried the fragments far and wide. The mob fought for these last memorials of David Alroy; and this little incident occasioned a great confusion.

In the meantime the negroes prepared the instruments of torture and of death.

“The obstinacy of this Jewish dog makes me mad,” said the king of Karasmé to his courtiers. “I will hold some parley with him before he dies.” The favourite minister entreated his sovereign to be content; but the royal beard grew so red, and the royal eyes flashed forth such terrible sparks of fire, that even the favourite minister at length gave way.

The trumpets sounded, the criers called silence, and the voice of Alp Arslan was again heard.

“Thou dog, dost see what is preparing for thee? Dost know what awaits thee in the halls of thy master Eblis? Can a Jew be influenced even by false pride? Is not life sweet? Is it not better to be my slipper-bearer than to be impaled?”

“Magnanimous Alp Arslan,” replied Alroy, in a tone of undisguised contempt; “thinkest thou that any torture can be equal to the recollection that I have been conquered by thee?”

“By my beard, he mocks me,” exclaimed the Karasmian monarch, “he defies me. Touch my robe. I will parley with him. Ye see no other than a hooded hawk, ye sons of a blind mother. This is a sorcerer; he hath yet some magic spell; he will yet save himself. He will fly into the air, or sink into the earth. He laughs at our tortures.” The king of Karasmé precipitately descended the steps of his throne, followed by his favourite minister, and his counsellors, and his captains, and the cadis, and the moollahs, and the imams, and the principal personages of the city.

“Sorcerer!” exclaimed Alp Arslan, “insolent sorcerer! base son of a base mother! dog of dogs! dost thou defy us? Does thy master Eblis whisper hope? Dost thou laugh at our punishment? Wilt thou fly into the air? wilt thou sink into the earth? eh, eh? Is it so, is it so?” The breathless monarch ceased, from the exhaustion of passion. He tore his beard up by the roots, he stamped with uncontrollable rage.

“Thou art wiser than thy counsellors, royal Alan; I do defy thee. My master, although my Eblis, has not deserted me. I laugh at thy punishments. Thy tortures I despise. I shall both sink into the earth, and mount into the air. Art thou answered?”

“By my beard,” exclaimed the enraged Arslan, “I am answered. Let Eblis save thee, if he can; and the king of Karasmé, the most famous master of the sabre in Asia, drew his blade like lightning from its sheath, and carried off the head of Alroy at a stroke. It fell, and as it fell, a smile of triumphant derision seemed to play upon the dying features of the hero, and to ask of his enemies, “Where now were all their tortures?”(16)

NOTES.

NOTE.—Page 10.

The policy of the son of Kareah.
Vid. Jeremiah, cap. 42.

NOTE.—Page 15.

The inviting gestures and the voluptuous grace of the dancing girls of Egypt.
A sculptor might find fine studies in the Egyptian Alwyn.

NOTE 1.—Page 17.

Go get us a kabob.
A most capital thing. Square lumps of meat run upon a skewer, and between each piece of meat, a most delicate slice of onion, and quickly broiled. A very favourite dish with the Turks. A kabob shop is like an English chop-house.

NOTE 2.—Page 19.

Six choice steeds sumptuously caparisoned.
Led horses always precede the advent of a great man. I think there were usually twelve before the sultan when he went to mosque, which he did in public every Friday.

NOTE 3.—Page 19.

Six Damascus sabres of unrivalled temper.
But sabres are not to be found at Damascus, any more than cheeses at Stilton, or oranges at Malta. The art of watering the blade is, however, practised, I believe, in Persia. A fine Damascus blade will fetch a long figure, fifty, or even one hundred guineas English.

NOTE 4.—Page 19.

A snow-white Anatolian charger.

The finest horses in the world are the Anatolian or Asiatic Turkish, from which all our best breeds have sprung, and not from the Arabian, which I believe to be little worth. It is against reason that the race should be so pre-eminent in a land without pasture. See an excellent letter on this subject signed "STRUB," in a recent number of that capital periodical work, the Sporting Magazine.

NOTE 5.—Page 20.

Roses from Rocnabad.

A river in Persia famous for its bowery banks of roses.

NOTE 6.—Page 20.

Screens made of the feather of a roc.

The screens and fans in the East, made of the plumage of roc birds, with jewelled handles, are very gorgeous.

NOTE 7.—Page 21.

A tremulous aigrette of brilliants.

Worn only by personages of the highest rank. The sultan presented Lord Nelson after the battle of the Nile with an aigrette of diamonds.

NOTE 8.—Page 36.

To send him the whole of the next course.

These compliments from the tables of the great are not uncommon in the East. When at the head quarters of the grand vizier at Yennina, his highness sent to myself and my travelling companions, a course from his table, singers and dancing girls.

NOTE 9.—Page 37.

The golden wine of Mount Lebanon.

A most delicious wine, from its colour, brilliancy and rare flavour, justly meriting this title, is made on Lebanon; but it will not unfortunately bear exportation, and even materially suffers in the voyage from the coast to Alexandria.

NOTE 10.—Page 46.

And the company of gardeners.

These gardeners of the serail form a very efficient body of police.

NOTE 11.—Page 51.

Alroy retired to the bath.

The bath is a principal scene of oriental life. Here the Asiatics pass a great portion of their day. The bath consists of a long suite of chambers of various temperatures, in which the various processes of the elaborate ceremony are performed.

NOTE 12.—Page 57.

We are the watchers of the moon.

The Feast of the New Moon is one of the most important festivals of the Hebrews. "Our year," says the learned author of the 'Rites and Ceremonies,' "is divided into twelve lunar months, some of which consist of twenty-nine, others of thirty days, which difference is occasioned by the various appearance of the new moon, in point of time: for if it appeared on the 30th day, the 29th was the last day of the precedent month; but if it did not appear till the 31st day, the 30th was the last day, and the 31st the first of the subsequent month; and that was an intercalary moon, of all which take the following account.

"Our nation heretofore, not only observing the rules of some fixed calculation, also celebrated the Feast of the New Moon, according to the phasis, or first appearance of the moon, which was done in compliance with God's command, as our received traditions inform us.

"Hence it came to pass that the first appearance was not to be determined only by rules of art, but also by the testimony of such persons as deposed before the sanhedrim, or great senate, that they had seen the new moon. So a committee of three were appointed from among the said sanhedrim to receive the deposition of the parties aforesaid, who, after having calculated what time the moon might possibly appear, despatched some persons into high and mountainous places, to observe and give their evidence accordingly, concerning the first appearance of the moon.

"As soon as the new moon was either consecrated, or appointed to be observed, notice was given by the sanhedrim to the rest of the nation, what day had been fixed for the new moon, or first day of the month, because that was to be the rule and measure, according to which they were obliged to keep their feasts and fasts in every month respectively.

"This notice was given to them in time of peace, by firing of beacons, set up for that purpose, (which was looked upon as the readiest way of communication), but in time of war, when all places were full of enemies, who made use of beacons to amuse our nation with, it was thought fit to discontinue it."

NOTE 13.—Page 89.

The women chatted at the fountain.

The bath and the fountain are the favourite scenes of feminine conversation.

NOTE 14.—Page 90.

Playing chess.

On the walls of the palace of Amenoph the Second, called Me-deenet Abuh, at Egyptian Thebes, the king is represented playing chess with the queen. This monarch reigned long before the Trojan war.

NOTE 15.—Page 97.

Impaled.

A friend of mine witnessed this horrible punishment in Upper Egypt. The victim was a man who had secretly murdered nine persons. He held an official post, and invited travellers and pilgrims to his house, whom he regularly disposed of and plundered. I regret that I have mislaid his MS. account of the ceremony.

NOTE 16.—Page 124.

In the Germen Davidis of Ganz, translated into Latin by Vorstius, Lug. 1654, is an extract from a Hebrew MS. containing an account of Alroy. I subjoin a passage respecting his death for the learned reader. "Scribit R. Maimonides, Sultanum interrogasse illum, num esset Messias, et dixisse, Sum, et quævisse ab illo regem, quodnam signum habes? Et respondisse, ut præcideret caput, et se in vitam reversurum. Tunc regem jussisse ut caput ejus amputarent, et obüsse; sed hoc illi dixisse, ne gravibus tormentis ipse enecaret."

"Septem annis ante decretum hoc, de quo supra locuti sumus, habuerunt Israelitæ vehementes angustias propter virum Belial, qui seipsum fecit Messiam; et rex atque principes valde accensi sunt excandescencia contra Judæos, ut dicerent, eos quærere interitum regni sui Messie petitione. Maledicti hujus nomen vocatum fuit David El-David aut Alroy ex urbe Omadia; et erat ibi cœtus magnus, circiter mille familias divites, refertas, honestas et felices continens. Atque Ecclesia hæc erat principium cœtum habitantium circa fluvium Sabbathion, atque erant plus quam centum Ecclesiæ. Erat hic initium regionis Mediæ, atque lingua eorum erat idiom n : inde autem usque ad regionem Golan est iter 50 dierum, sub imperio Regis Persiæ, cui dant quotannis tributum a 15 ultra aureum unum. Vir autem hic David El-David studuit in principe captivitatis Chasdai et coram eccellente Scholarcha Bagdad, qui eximius erat sapiens in Thalmude et omnibus Exoticis, atque in omnibus libris divinorum, magorum et rerum. Hic vero David El-David ex audacia et arrogantia se elevavit manum contra regem, et collegit Judæos habi-monte Chophtan, et seduxit eos, ut exirent in prælium cum gentibus. Ostendit iis signa ; sed ignorabant quam virtutem enim homines, qui asserebant istud per modum magis iugitationis fieri, alii dicebant, potentiam ejus magnam esse manum Dei. Qui consortium ejus veniebant, vocabant eum i, eumque laudabant et extollebant.

in Regno Persiæ alio quodam tempore surrexit vir quidam Ju- seipsum fecit Messiam, atque valde prospere egit ; et nu- ex Israele ad illum conflavit populus. Cum vero audiret em ejus potentiam, atque propositum ejus esse descendere in cum ipso, misit ad Judæos congregatos in regione sua, xit : Nisi egerint cum hocce viro, ut e medio tollatur, certo e eos omnes gladio interempturum, et uno die infantes ac deleturum. Tunc congregatus est totus populus Israëlis que contendit ad virum illum, ceciditque coram illo in ter- hementer supplicatus est, clamavit atque ploravit, ut reve- a via sua : et cur seipsum et omnes afflictos conjiceret in m ; jam enim regem jurasse se immisurum eis gladium, et) posset intueri afflictionem omnium costuum Persiæ. Re- Veni servatum vos, et non vultis. Quem metuitis ? Quis- am me consistet ? Et quid aget rex Persiæ, ut non reformidet adum meum ? Interrogarunt eum, quodnam signum haberet set Messias. Respondit, QUIA FELICITER REM GERERET, NE- SSIAM OPUS HABERE ALIO SIGNO. Responderunt multos egisse, neque prospera usos fuisse fortuna ; tunc rejecit ie sua cum superba indignatione."

END OF ALROY.

THE RISE OF ISKANDER.

THE

RISE OF ISKANDER.

I.

THE sun had set behind the mountains, and the rich plain of Athens was suffused with the violet glow of a Grecian eve. A light breeze rose; the olive groves awoke from their noonday trance, and rustled with returning animation, and the pennons of the Turkish squadron, that lay at anchor in the harbour of Piræus, twinkled in the lively air. From one gate of the city the women came forth in procession to the fountain; from another, a band of sumptuous horsemen sallied out, and threw their wanton javelins in the invigorating sky, as they galloped over the plain. The voice of birds, the buzz of beauteous insects, the breath of beauteous flowers, the quivering note of the nightingale, the pittering call of the grasshopper, and the perfume of the violet, shrinking from the embrace of the twilight breeze, filled the purple air with music and with odour.

A solitary being stood upon the towering crag of the Acropolis, amid the ruins of the temple of Minerva, and gazed upon the inspiring scene. Around him rose the matchless memorials of antique art; immortal columns whose symmetry baffles modern proportion, serene Caryatides, bearing with greater grace a graceful burthen, carvings of delicate precision, and friezes breathing with heroic life. Apparently the stranger, though habited as a Moslem, was not insensible to the genius of the locality, nor indeed would his form and countenance have misbecome a contemporary of Pericles and Phidias. In the prime of life, and far above the common stature, but with a frame, the muscular power of which was even exceeded by its almost ideal symmetry, his high white forehead, his straight profile, his oval countenance, and his curling lip, exhibited the same visage that had inspired the sculptor of the surrounding demigods.

VOL. II.—M

The dress of the stranger, although gorgeous, was, however, certainly not classic. A crimson shawl was wound round his head, and glittered with a trembling aigrette of diamonds. His vest, which set tight to his form, was of green velvet, richly embroidered with gold and pearls. Over this he wore a very light jacket of crimson velvet, equally embroidered, and lined with sable. He wore also the full white camese common among the Albanians; and while his feet were protected by sandals, the lower part of his legs was guarded by greaves of embroidered green velvet. From a broad belt of scarlet leather peeped forth the jewelled hilts of a variety of daggers, and by his side was an enormous scimeter, in a scabbard of chased silver.

The stranger gazed upon the wide prospect before him with an air of pensive abstraction. "Beautiful Greece," he exclaimed, "thou art still my country. A mournful lot is mine, a strange and mournful lot, yet not uncheered by hope. I am at least a warrior; and this arm, though trained to war against thee, will not well forget, in the quick hour of battle, the blood that flows within it. Themistocles saved Greece and died a satrap : I am bred one—let me reverse our lots, and die at least a patriot.”

At this moment the evening hymn to the Virgin arose from a neighbouring convent. The stranger started as the sacred melody floated towards him, and taking a small golden cross from his heart, he kissed it with devotion, and then descending the steep of the citadel, entered the city.

He proceeded along the narrow winding streets of Athens until he at length arrived in front of a marble palace, in the construction of which the architect had certainly not consulted the surrounding models which time had spared to him, but which, however it might have offended a classic taste, presented altogether a magnificent appearance. Half-a-dozen guards, whose shields and helmets somewhat oddly contrasted with two pieces of cannon, one of which was ostentatiously placed on each side of the portal, and which had been presented to the prince of Athens by the republic of Venice, lounged before the entrance, and paid their military homage to the stranger as he passed them. He passed them and entered a large quadrangular garden, surrounded by arcades, supported by a considerable number of thin, low pillars, of barbarous workmanship and various-coloured marbles. In the midst of the garden rose a fountain, whence the bubbling waters flowed in artificial channels through vistas of orange and lemon trees. By the side of the fountain, on a luxurious couch, his eyes fixed upon a richly-illuminated volume, reposed Nicæus, the youthful prince of Athens.

“ Ah! is it you ?” said the prince, looking up with a smile, as the stranger advanced. “ You have arrived just in time to remind me that we must do something more than read the Persæ—we must act it.”

“My dear Nicæus,” replied the stranger, “I have arrived only to bid you farewell.”

“Farewell!” exclaimed the prince in a tone of surprise and sorrow, and he rose from the couch. “Why! what is this?”

“It is too true,” said the stranger, and he led the way down one of the walks. “Events have occurred which entirely baffle all our plans and prospects, and placed me in a position as difficult as it is harrowing. Hunniades has suddenly crossed the Danube in great force, and carried every thing before him. I am ordered to proceed to Albania instantly, and to repair to the camp at the head of the Epirots.”

“Indeed!” said Nicæus, with a thoughtful air. “My letters did not prepare me for this. ’Tis sudden! Is Amurath himself in the field?”

“No; Karam Bey commands. I have accounted for my delay to the sultan by pretended difficulties in our treaty, and have held out the prospect of a large tribute.”

“When we are plotting that that tribute should be paid no longer!” added Nicæus with a smile.

“Alas! my dear friend,” replied the Turkish commander, “my situation has now become critical. Hitherto my services for the Moslemin have been confined to acting against nations of their own faith. I am now suddenly summoned to combat against my secret creed, and the best allies of what I must yet call my secret country. The movement, it appears to me, must be made now or never, and I cannot conceal from myself, that it never could have been prosecuted under less auspicious circumstances.”

“What, you desponding!” exclaimed Nicæus, “then I must despair. Your sanguine temper has alone supported me throughout all our dangerous hopes."

"And Æschylus?" said the stranger smiling.

"And Æschylus, certainly," replied Nicæus; "but I have lived to find even Æschylus insipid. I pant for action."

"It may be nearer than we can foresee," replied the stranger. "There is a God who fashions all things. He will not desert a righteous cause. He knoweth that my thoughts are as pure as my situation is difficult. I have some dim ideas still brooding in my mind, but we will not discuss them now. I must away, dear prince. The breeze serves fairly. Have you ever seen Hunniades?"

"I was educated at the court of Transylvania," replied Nicæus, looking down with a somewhat embarrassed air. "He is a famous knight, Christendom's chief bulwark."

The Turkish commander sighed. "When we meet again," he said, "may we meet with brighter hopes and more buoyant spirits. At present, I must, indeed, say farewell."

"The prince turned with a dejected countenance, and pressed his companion to his heart. "'Tis a sad end," said he, "to all our happy hours and lofty plans."

"You are as yet too young to quarrel with fortune," replied the stranger, "and, for myself, I have not yet settled my accounts with her. However, for the present, farewell, dear Nicæus!"

"Farewell," replied the prince of Athens, "farewell, dear Iskander!"

II.

Iskander was the youngest son of the prince of Epirus, who, with the other Grecian princes, had, at the commencement of the reign of Amurah the second, in vain resisted the progress of the Turkish arms in Europe. The prince of Epirus had obtained peace by yielding his four sons as hostages to the Turkish sovereign, who engaged that they should be educated in all the accomplishments of their rank, and with a due deference to their faith. On the death of the prince of Epirus, however, Amurath could not resist the opportunity that then offered itself of adding to his empire the rich principality he had long coveted. A Turkish force instantly marched into Epirus, and seized upon Croia, the capital city, and the children of its late ruler were doomed to death. The beauty, talents, and valour of the youngest son, saved him, however, from the fate of his poisoned brothers. Iskander was educated at Adrianople, in the Moslemin faith, and as he, at a very early age, excelled in feats of arms all the Moslemin warriors, he became a prime favourite of the sultan, and speedily rose in his service to the highest rank.

At this period the irresistible progress of the Turkish arms was the subject of alarm throughout all Christendom.

Constantinople, then the capital of the Greek empire, had already been more than once besieged by the predecessors of Amurah, and had only been preserved by fortunate accidents and humiliating terms. The despots of Bosnia, Servia and Bulgaria, and the Grecian princes of Ætolia, Macedon, Epirus, Athens, Phocis, Bœotia, and indeed of all the regions to the straits of Corinth, were tributaries to Amurath, and the rest of Europe was only preserved from his grasp by the valour of the Hungarians and the Poles, whom a fortunate alliance had now united under the sovereignty of Uladislaus, who, incited by the pious eloquence of the cardinal of St Angelo, the legate of the pope, and, yielding to the tears and supplications of the despot of Serbia, had, at the time our story opens, quitted Buda, at the head of an immense army, crossed the Danube, and joining his valiant viceroy, the famous John Hunniades, vaivode of Translyvania, defeated the Turks with great slaughter, relieved all Bulgaria, and pushed on to the base of mount Hæmus, known in modern times as the celebrated Balkan. Here the Turkish general, Karam Bey, awaited the Christians, and hither to his assistance was Iskander commanded to repair at the head of a body of Janissaries, who had accompanied him to Greece, and the tributary Epirots.

Had Iskander been influenced by vulgar ambition, his loftiest desires might have been fully gratified by the career which Amurath projected for him. The Turkish sultan destined for the Grecian prince the hand of one of his daughters, and the principal command of his armies. He lavished upon him the highest dignities and boundless wealth; and, whether it arose from a feeling of remorse, or of affection for a warrior, whose unexampled valour and unrivalled skill had already added some of the finest provinces of Asia to his rule, it is certain that Iskander might have exercised over Amurath a far greater degree of influence than was enjoyed by any other of his courtiers. But the heart of Iskander responded with no sympathy to these flattering favours. His Turkish education could never eradicate from his memory the consciousness that he was a Greek; and although he was brought up in the Moslemin faith, he had, at an early period of his career, secretly recurred to the creed of his Christian fathers. He beheld in Amurath the murderer of his dearest kinsmen, and the oppressor of his country; and although a certain calmness of temper, and coolness of judgment, which very early developed themselves in his character, prevented him from ever giving any indication of his secret feelings, Iskander had long meditated on the exalted duty of freeing his country.

Dispatched to Greece, to arrange the tributes and the treaties of the Grecian princes, Iskander became acquainted with the young Nicæus; and their acquaintance soon matured into friendship. Nicæus was inexperienced; but nature had not intended him for action. The young prince of Athens would loll by the side of a fountain, and dream of the wonders of old days. Surrounded by his eunuchs, his priests, and his courtiers, he envied Leonidas, and would have emulated Themistocles. He was passionately devoted to the ancient literature of his country, and had the good taste, rare at that time, to prefer Demosthenes and Lysias to Chrysostom and Gregory, and the choruses of the Grecian theatre to the hymns of the Greek church. The sustained energy and noble simplicity of the character of Iskander, seemed to recall to the young prince the classic heroes, over whom he was so often musing, while the enthusiasm and fancy of Nicæus, and all that apparent weakness of will, and those quick vicissitudes of emotion, to which men of a fine susceptibility are subject, equally engaged the sympathy of the more vigorous and constant and experienced mind of his companion.

To Nicæus, Iskander had, for the first time in his life, confided much of his secret heart; and the young prince fired at the inspiring tale. Often they consulted over the fortunes of their country, and, excited by their mutual invention, at length even dared to hope that they might affect its deliverance, when Iskander was summoned to the army. It was a mournful parting. Both of them felt that the last few months of their lives had owed many charms to their companionship. The parting of friends, united by sympathetic tastes, is always painful; and friends, unless their sympathy subsist, had much better never meet. Iskander stepped into the ship, sorrowful, but serene; Nicæus returned to his palace moody and fretful; lost his temper with his courtiers, and, when he was alone, even shed tears.

III.

Three weeks had elapsed since the parting of Iskander and Nicæus, when the former, at the head of ten thousand men, entered, by a circuitous route, the defiles of Mount Hæmus, and approached the Turkish camp, which had been pitched upon a vast and elevated table-ground, commanded on all sides by superior heights, which, however, were fortified and well garrisoned by Janissaries. The Epirots halted, and immediately prepared to raise their tents, while their commander, attended by a few of his officers, instantly proceeded to the pavilion of Karam Bey.

The arrival of Iskander diffused great joy among the soldiery; and as he passed through the encampment, the exclamations of the Turkish warriors announced how ready they were to be led to the charge by a chieftain who had been ever successful. A guard of honour, by the orders of Karam Bey, advanced, to conduct Iskander to his presence; and soon, entering the pavilion, the Grecian prince exchanged courtesies with the Turkish general. After the formal compliments had passed, Karam Bey waved his hand, and the pavilion was cleared, with the exception of Mousa, the chief secretary, and favourite of Karam. "You have arrived in good time, Iskander, to assist in the destruction of the Christian dogs," said the Bey. "Flushed with their accursed success, they have advanced too far. Twice they have endeavoured to penetrate the mountains; and each time they have been forced to retire, with great loss. The passages are well barricadoed with timber and huge fragments of rock. The dogs have lost all heart, and are sinking under the joint sufferings of hunger and cold. Our scouts tell me they exhibit symptoms of retreat. We must rush down from the mountains, and annihilate them."

"Is Hunniades here in person?" inquired Iskander.

"He is here," replied Karam, "in person—the dog of dogs! Come, Iskander, his head would be a fine Ramadan present to Amurath. 'Tis a head worth three tails, I guess?"

Mousa, the chief secretary, indulged in some suppressed laughter at this joke. Iskander smiled.

"If they retreat we must assuredly attack them," observed Iskander, musingly. "I have a persuasion that Hunniades and myself will soon meet."

"If there be truth in the prophet!" exclaimed Karam, "I have no doubt of it. Hunniades is reserved for you, Bey. We shall hold up our heads at court yet, Iskander. You have had letters lately?"

"Some slight words."

"No mention of us, of course?"

"Nothing, except some passing praise of your valour and discretion."

"We do our best, we do our best. Will Isa Bey have Ætolia, think you?"

"I have no thoughts. Our royal father will not forget his children, and Isa Bey is a most valiant chieftain."

"You heard not that he was coming here?" inquired Karam.

"Have you?" responded the cautious Iskander.

"A rumour, a rumour," replied Karam. "He is at Adrianople, think you?"

"It may be so: I am, you know, from Athens."

"True, true. We shall beat them, Iskander, we shall beat them."

"For myself, I feel sanguine," replied the prince, and he arose to retire. "I must at present to my men. We must ascertain more accurately the movements of the Christians before we decide on our own. I am inclined myself to reconnoitre them. How far may it be?"

"There is not room to form our array between them and the mountains," replied Karam.

"'Tis well. Success attend the true believers! By to-morrow's dawn we shall know more."

IV.

Iskander returned to his men. Night was coming on. Fires and lights blazed and sparkled in every direction. The air was clear but very cold. He entered his tent, and muffling himself up in his pelisse of saibles, he mounted his horse, and declining any attendance, rode for some little distance, until he had escaped from the precincts of the camp. Then he turned his horse towards one of the wildest passes of the mountain, and galloping at great speed, never stopped until he had gained a considerable ascent. The track became steep and rugged. The masses of loose stone rendered his progress slow; but his Anatolian charger still bore him at intervals bravely, and in three hours' time he had gained the summit of Mount Hæmus. A brilliant moon flooded the broad plains of Bulgaria with shadowy light. At the base of the mountainous range, the red watch-fires denoted the situation of the Christian camp.

Iskander proceeded down the descent with an audacious rapidity; but his charger was thoroughbred, and his moments were golden. Ere midnight, he had reached the outposts of the enemy, and was challenged by a sentinel.

"Who goes there?"

"A friend to Christendom."

"The word?"

"I have it not—nay, calmly. I am alone, but I am not unarmed. I do not know the word. I come from a far country, and bear important tidings to the great Hunniades; conduct me to that chief."

"May I be crucified if I will," responded the sentinel, "before I know who and what you are. Come, keep off, unless you wish to try the effect of a Polish lance," continued the sentinel; "'tis something, I assure you, not less awkward than your Greek fire, if Greek indeed you be."

"My friend, you are a fool," said Iskander,

“but time is too precious to argue any longer.” So saying, the Turkish commander dismounted, and taking up the brawny sentinel in his arms with the greatest ease, threw him over his shoulder, and threatening the astounded soldier with instant death if he struggled, covered him with his pelisse, and entered the camp.

They approached a watch-fire, around which several soldiers were warming themselves.

“Who goes there?” inquired a second sentinel.

“A friend to Christendom,” answered Iskander.

“The word?”

Iskander hesitated.

“The word, or I’ll let fly,” said the sentinel, elevating his cross bow.

“‘The Bridge of Buda,’” instantly replied the terrified prisoner beneath the pelisse of Iskander.

“Why did not you answer before, then?” said one of the guards.

“And why do you mock us by changing your voice?” said another. “Come, get on with you, and no more jokes.”

Iskander proceeded through a street of tents, in some of which were lights, but all of which were silent. At length he met the esquire of a Polish knight returning from a convivial meeting, not a little elevated.

“Who are you?” inquired Iskander.

“I am an esquire,” replied the gentleman.

“A shrewd man, I doubt not, who would make his fortune,” replied Iskander. “You must know great things have happened. Being on guard, I have taken a prisoner, who has deep secrets to divulge to the lord Hunniades. Thither, to his pavilion, I am now bearing him. But he is a stout barbarian, and almost too much for me. Assist me in carrying him to the pavilion of Hunniades, and you shall have all the reward and half the fame."

"You are a very civil spoken young gentleman," said the esquire. "I think I know your voice. Your name, if I mistake not, is Leckinski?"

"A relative. We had a common ancestor."

"I thought so. I know the Leekinskies ever by their voice. I am free to help you on the terms you mention—all the reward and half the fame. 'Tis a strong barbarianism, is it? We cannot cut its throat, or it will not divulge. All the reward and half the fame! I will be a knight to-morrow. It seems a sort of fish, and has a smell."

The esquire seized the shoulders of the prisoner, who would have spoken had he not been terrified by the threats of Iskander, who carrying the legs of the sentinel, allowed the Polish gentleman to lead the way to the pavilion of Hunniades. Thither they soon arrived; and Iskander, dropping his burthen, and leaving the prisoner without to the charge of his assistant, entered the pavilion of the general of the Hungarians.

He was stopped in a small outer apartment by an officer, who inquired his purpose, and to whom he repeated his desire to see the Hungarian leader, without loss of time, on important business. The officer hesitated; but, summoning several guards, left Iskander in their custody, and stepping behind a curtain, disappeared. Iskander heard voices, but could distinguish no words. Soon the officer returned, and, ordering the guards to disarm and search Iskander, directed the Grecian prince to follow him. Drawing aside the curtain, Iskander and his attendant entered a low apartment of considerable size. It was hung with skins. A variety of armour and dresses were piled on couches. A middle-aged man, of majestic appearance, muffled up in a pelisse of furs, with long chestnut hair, and a cap of crimson velvet and ermine, was walking up and down the apartment, and dictating some instructions to a person who was kneeling on the ground, and writing by the bright flame of a brazen lamp. The bright flame of the brazen lamp fell full upon the face of the secretary. Iskander beheld a most beautiful woman.

She looked up as Iskander entered. Her large dark eyes glanced through his soul. Her raven hair descended to her shoulders in many curls on each side of her face, and was braided with strings of immense pearls. A broad cap of white fox-skin crowned her whiter forehead. Her features were very small, but sharply moulded, and a delicate tint gave animation to her clear-fair cheek. She looked up as Iskander entered, with an air rather of curiosity than embarrassment.

Hunniades stopped, and examined his visitor with a searching inquisition. "Whence come you?" inquired the Hungarian chieftain.

"From the Turkish camp," was the answer.

"An envoy or a deserter?"

"Neither."

"What then?"

"A convert."

"Your name?"

"Lord Hunniades," said Iskander, "that is for your private ear. I am unarmed, and were I otherwise, the first knight of Christendom can scarcely fear. I am one in birth and rank your equal; if not in fame, at least, I trust, in honour. My time is all-precious: I can scarcely stay here while my horse breathes. Dismiss your attendant."

Hunniades darted a glance at his visitor which would have baffled a weaker brain, but Iskander stood the scrutiny calm and undisturbed. "Go, Stanislaus," said the vaivode to the officer. "This lady, sir," continued the chieftain, "is my daughter, and one from whom I have no secrets."

Iskander bowed lowly as the officer disappeared.

"And now," said Hunniades, "to business. Your purpose?"

"I am a Grecian prince, and a compulsory ally of the Moslemin. In a word, my purpose here is to arrange a plan by which we may effect at the same time your triumph and my freedom."

"To whom, then, have I the honour of speaking?" inquired Hunniades.

"My name, great Hunniades, is perhaps not altogether unknown to you: they call me Iskander."

"What, the right arm of Amurath, the conqueror of Caramania, the flower of Turkish chivalry? Do I indeed behold that matchless warrior?" exclaimed Hunniades, and he held forth his hand to his guest, and ungirding his own sword, offered it to the prince. "Iduna," continued Hunniades, to his daughter, "you at length behold Iskander."

"My joy is great, sir," replied Iduna, "if I indeed rightly understand that we may count the prince Iskander a champion of the cross."

Iskander took from his heart his golden crucifix and kissed it before her. "This has been my companion and consolation for long years, lady," said Iskander; "you, perhaps, know my mournful history, Hunniades. Hitherto my pretended sovereign has not required me to bare my scimitar against my Christian brethren. That hour, however, has at length arrived, and it has decided me to adopt a line of conduct long meditated. Karam Bey, who is aware of your necessities, the moment you commence your retreat, will attack you. I shall command his left wing. In spite of his superior power and position, draw up in array, and meet him with confidence. I propose, at a convenient moment in the day, to withdraw my troops, and with the Epirots hasten to my native country, and at once raise the standard of independence. It is a bold measure, but success is the child of audacity. We must assist each other with mutual diversions. Single-handed it is in vain for me to commence a struggle, which, with all adventitious advantages, will require the utmost exertion of energy, skill, and patience. But if yourself and the king Uladislaus occupy the armies of Amurath in Bulgaria, I am not without hope of ultimate success, since I have to inspire me all the most urgent interests of humanity, and combat, at the same time, for my God, my country, and my lawful crown."

"Brave prince, I pledge you my troth," said Hunniades, coming forward and seizing his hand; "and while Iskander and Hunniades live, they will never cease until they have achieved their great and holy end."

"It is a solemn compact," said Iskander, "more sacred than if registered by all the scribes of Christendom. Lady Iduna, your prayers!"

"They are ever with the champions of the cross," replied the daughter of Hunniades. She rose, the large cloak in which she was enveloped fell from her exquisite form. "Noble Iskander, this rosary is from the holy sepulchre," continued Iduna; "wear it for the sake and memory of that blessed Saviour, who died for our sins."

Iskander held forth his arm and touched her delicate hand as he received the rosary, which, pressing to his lips, he placed round his neck.

"Great Hunniades," said the Grecian prince,

“I must cross the mountains before dawn. Let me venture to entreat that we should hear to-morrow that the Christian camp is in retreat.”

“Let it be even so,” said the Hungarian, after some thought, “and may to-morrow’s sun bring brighter days to Christendom.” And with these words terminated the brief and extraordinary visit of Iskander to the Christian general.

V.

The intelligence of the breaking up of the Christian camp, and the retreat of the Christian army, soon reached the divan of Karam Bey, who immediately summoned Iskander to consult on the necessary operations. The chieftains agreed that instant pursuit was indispensable, and soon the savage Hæmus poured forth from its green bosom swarms of that light cavalry which was perhaps even a more fatal arm of the Turkish power than the famous Janissaries themselves. They hovered on the rear of the retreating Christians, charged the wavering, captured the unwary. It was impossible to resist their sudden and impetuous movements, which rendered their escape as secure as their onset was overwhelming. Wearied at length by the repeated assaults, Hunniades, who, attended by some chosen knights, had himself repaired to the rear, gave orders for the army to halt and offer battle.

Their pursuers instantly withdrew to a distance, and gradually forming into two divisions, awaited the arrival of the advancing army of the Turks. The Moslemin came forward in fierce array, and with the sanguine courage inspired by expected triumph. Very conspicuous was Iskander bounding in his crimson vest upon his ebon steed, and waving his gleaming scimeter.

The Janissaries charged, calling upon Allah! with an awful shout. The Christian knights, invoking the Christian saints, received the Turks at the points of their lances. But many a noble lance was shattered that morn, and many a bold rider and worthy steed bit the dust of that field, borne down by the irresistible numbers of their fierce adversaries. Every where the balls and the arrows whistled through the air, and sometimes an isolated shriek, heard amid the general clang, announced another victim to the fell and mysterious agency of the Greek fire.

Hunniades, while he performed all the feats of an approved warrior, watched with anxiety the disposition of the Turkish troops. Hitherto, from the nature of their position, but a portion of both armies had interfered in the contest, and as yet, Iskander had kept aloof. But now, as the battle each instant raged with more fury, and as it was evident that ere long the main force of both armies must be brought into collision, Hunniades, with a terrible suspense, watched whether the Grecian prince were willing, or even capable of executing his plan. Without this fulfilment, the Christian hero could not conceal from himself that the day must be decided against the cross.

In the mean time Iskander marked the course of events with not less eagerness than Hunniades. Already Karam Bey had more than once summoned him to bring the Epirots into action. He assented; but an hour passed away without changing his position. At length, more from astonishment than rage, the Turkish commander sent his chief secretary Mousa himself to impress his wishes upon his colleague, and obtain some explanation of his views and conduct. Mousa found Iskander surrounded by some of the principal Epirot nobles, all mounted on horseback, and standing calmly under a wide-spreading plane tree. The chief secretary of Karam Bey was too skilful a courtier to permit his countenance to express his feelings, and he delivered himself of his mission rather as if he had come to request advice, than to communicate a reprimand.

“Your master is a wise man, Mousa;” replied Iskander; “but even Karam Bey may be mistaken. He deems that a battle is not to be won by loitering under a shadowy tree. Now I differ with him, and I even mean to win this day by such a piece of truancy. However, it may certainly now be time for more active work. You smile encouragement, good Mousa. Giorgio, Demetrius, to your duty!”

At these words, two stout Epirots advanced to the unfortunate secretary, seized and bound him, and placed him on horseback before one of their comrades.

“Now all who love their country follow me!” exclaimed Iskander. So saying, and at the head of five thousand horsemen, Iskander quitted the field at a rapid pace.

VI.

With incredible celerity Iskander and his cavalry dashed over the plains of Roumelia, and never halted except for short and hurried intervals of rest and repose, until they had entered the mountainous borders of Epirus, and were within fifty miles of its capital, Croia. On the eve of entering the kingdom of his fathers, Iskander ordered his guards to produce the chief secretary of Karam Bey. Exhausted with fatigue, vexation, and terror, the disconsolate Mousa was led forward.

"Cheer up, worthy Mousa!" said Iskander, lying his length on the green turf. "We have had a sharp ride; but I doubt not we shall soon find ourselves, by the blessing of God, in good quarters. There is a city at hand which they call Croia, in which once, as the rumour runs, the son of my father should not have had to go seek for an entrance. No matter. Methinks, worthy Mousa, thou art the only man in our society that can sign thy name. Come now, write me an order signed Karam Bey to the governor of this said city, for its delivery up to the valiant champion of the crescent, Iskander, and thou shalt ride in future at a pace more suitable to a secretary."

The worthy Mousa humbled himself to the ground, and then taking his writing materials from his girdle, inscribed the desired order, and delivered it to Iskander, who, glancing at the inscription, pushed it into his vest.

"I shall proceed at once to Croia, with a few friends," said Iskander; "do you, my bold companions, follow me this eve in various parties, and by various routes. At dead of the second night, collect in silence before the gates of Croia!"

Thus speaking, Iskander called for his now refreshed charger, and, accompanied by two hundred horsemen, bade farewell for a brief period to his troops, and soon having crossed the mountains, descended into the fertile plains of Epirus.

When the sun rose in the morning, Iskander and his friends beheld at the further end of the plain a very fine city shining in the light. It was surrounded with lofty turretted walls flanked by square towers, and was built upon a gentle eminence, which gave it a very majestic appearance. Behind it rose a lofty range of purple mountains of very picturesque form, and the highest peaks capped with snow. A noble lake, from which troops of wild fowl occasionally rose, expanded like a sheet of silver on one side of the city. The green breast of the contiguous hills sparkled with white houses.

“Behold Croia!” exclaimed Iskander. “Our old fathers could choose a site, comrades. We shall see whether they expended their time and treasure for strangers, or their own seed.” So saying, he spurred his horse, and with panting hearts and smiling faces, Iskander and his company had soon arrived in the vicinity of the city.

The city was surrounded by a beautiful region of corn-fields and fruit trees. The road was arched with the overhanging boughs. The birds chirped on every spray. It was a blithe and merry morn. Iskander plucked a bunch of olives as he cantered along. “Dear friends,” he said, looking round with an inspiring smile, “let us gather our first harvest!” And, thereupon, each putting forth his rapid hand, seized, as he rushed by, the emblem of possession, and following the example of his leader, placed it in his cap.

They arrived at the gates of the city, which was strongly garrisoned; and Iskander, followed by his train, galloped up the height of the citadel. Alighting from his horse, he was ushered into the divan of the governor, an ancient pacha, who received the conqueror of Caramania with all the respect that became so illustrious a champion of the crescent. After the usual forms of ceremonious hospitality, Iskander, with a courteous air, presented him the order for delivering up the citadel; and the old pacha, resigning himself to the loss of his post with oriental submission, instantly delivered the keys of the citadel and town to Iskander, and requested permission immediately to quit the late scene of his command.

Quitting the citadel, Iskander now proceeded through the whole town, and in the afternoon reviewed the Turkish garrison in the great square. As the late governor was very anxious to quit Croia that very day, Iskander insisted on a considerable portion of the garrison accompanying him as a guard of honour, and returning the next morning. The rest he divided in several quarters, and placed the gates in charge of his own companions.

At midnight the Epirots, faithful to their orders, arrived and united beneath the walls of the city, and after interchanging the signals agreed upon, the gates were opened. A large body instantly marched and secured the citadel. The rest, conducted by appointed leaders, surrounded the Turks in their quarters. And suddenly, in the noon of night, in that great city, arose a clang so dreadful that people leapt up from their sleep and stared with stupor. Instantly the terrace of every house blazed with torches, and it became as light as day. Troops of armed men were charging down the streets brandishing their scimeters and yataghans, and exclaiming, "The Cross, the Cross!"—"Liberty!"—"Greece!"—"Iskander and Epirus!" The townsmen recognized their countrymen by their language and their dress. The name of Iskander acted as a spell. They stopt not to inquire. A magic sympathy at once persuaded them that this great man had, by the grace of heaven, recurred to the creed and country of his fathers. And so every townsman, seizing the nearest weapon, with a spirit of patriotic frenzy, rushed into the streets, crying out "The Cross, the cross! Liberty! Greece! Iskander and Epirus!" Ay! even the women lost all womanly fears, and stimulated instead of soothing the impulse of their masters. They fetched them arms, they held the torches, they sent them forth with vows and prayers and imprecations, their children clinging to their robes, and repeating with enthusiasm, phrases which they could not comprehend.

The Turks fought with the desperation of men who feel that they are betrayed, and must be victims. The small and isolated bodies were soon massacred, all with cold steel, for at this time, although some of the terrible inventions of modern warfare were introduced, their use was not general. The citadel, indeed, was fortified with cannon; but the greater part of the soldiery trusted to their crooked swords, and their unerring javelins. The main force of the Turkish garrison had been quartered in an old palace of the archbishop, situate in the middle of the city on a slightly rising and open ground, a massy building of rustic stone. Here the Turks, although surrounded, defended themselves desperately, using their cross-bows with terrible effect; and hither, the rest of the city being now secured, Iskander himself prepared to achieve its complete deliverance.

The Greeks had endeavoured to carry the principal entrance of the palace by main force, but the strength of the portal had resisted their utmost exertions, and the arrows of the besieged had at length forced them to retire to a distance. Iskander directed that two pieces of cannon should be dragged down from the citadel, and then played against the entrance. In the meantime, he ordered immense piles of damp faggots to be lit before the building, the smoke of which prevented the besieged from taking any aim. The ardour of the people was so great, that the cannon were soon served against the palace, and their effects were speedily remarked. The massy portal shook; a few blows of the battering ram, and it fell. The Turks sallied forth, were received with a shower of Greek fire, and driven in with agonizing yells. Some endeavoured to escape from the windows, and were speared or cut down; some appeared wringing their hands in despair upon the terraced roof. Suddenly the palace was announced to be on fire. A tall white blueish flame darted up from a cloud of smoke, and soon, as if by magic, the whole back of the building was encompassed with rising tongues of red and raging light. Amid a Babel of shrieks, and shouts, and cheers, and prayers, and curses, the roof of the palace fell in with a crash, which produced amid the besiegers an awful and momentary silence, but in an instant they started from their strange inactivity, and rushing forward, leapt into the smoking ruins, and at the same time completed the massacre and achieved their freedom.

VII.

At break of dawn Iskander sent couriers throughout all Epirus, announcing the fall of Croia, and that he had raised the standard of independence in his ancient country. He also despatched a trusty messenger to prince Nicæus, at Athens, and to the great Hunniades. The people were so excited throughout all Epirus, at this great and unthought of intelligence, that they simultaneously rose in all the open country, and massacred the Turks, and the towns were only restrained in a forced submission to Amurath, by the strong garrisons of the sultan.

Now Iskander was very anxious to effect the removal of these garrisons without loss of time, in order that if Amurath sent a great power against him, as he expected, the invading army might have nothing to rely upon but its own force, and that his attention might not in any way be diverted from effecting their overthrow. Therefore, as soon as his troops had rested, and he had formed his new recruits into some order, which, with their willing spirits, did not demand many days, Iskander set out from Croia, at the head of twelve thousand men, and marched against the strong city of Petrella, meeting in his way the remainder of the garrison of Croia on their return, who surrendered themselves to him at discretion. Petrella was only one day's march from Croia, and when Iskander arrived there he requested a conference with the governor, and told his tale so well, representing the late overthrow of the Turks by Hunniades, and the incapacity of Amurath at present to relieve him, that the Turkish commander agreed to deliver up the place, and leave the country with his troops, particularly as the alternative of Iskander to these easy terms was ever conquest without quarter. And thus, by a happy mixture of audacity and adroitness, the march of Iskander throughout Epirus, was rather like a triumph than a campaign, the Turkish garrisons imitating, without any exception, the conduct of their comrades at Petrella, and dreading the fate of their comrades at the capital. In less than a month, Iskander returned to Epirus, having delivered the whole country from the Moslemin yoke.

Hitherto Iskander had heard nothing either of Hunniades or Nicæus. He learnt therefore with great interest as he passed through the gates of the city that the prince of Athens had arrived at Croia the preceding eve, and also that the messenger had returned from the Hungarian camp. Amid the acclamations of an enthusiastic people, Iskander once more ascended the citadel of Croia. Nicæus received him at the gate. Iskander sprang from his horse, and embraced his friend. Hand in hand, and followed by their respective trains, they entered the fortress palace.

"My dear friend," said Iskander, when they were once more alone, "you see we were right not to despair. Two months have scarcely elapsed since we parted without a prospect, or with the most gloomy one, and now we are in a fair way of achieving all that we can desire. Epirus is free!"

"I came to claim my share in its emancipation," said Nicæus with a smile, "but Iskander is another Cæsar!"

"You will have many opportunities yet, believe me, Nicæus, of proving your courage and your patriotism," replied Iskander, "Amurath, will never allow this affair to pass over in this quiet manner. I did not commence this struggle without a conviction that it would demand all the energy and patience of a long life. I shall be rewarded if I leave freedom as an heritage to my countrymen; but for the rest, I feel that I bid farewell to every joy of life, except the ennobling consciousness of performing a noble duty. In the meantime, I understand a messenger awaits me here from the great Hunniades. Unless that shield of Christendom maintain himself in his present position, our chance of ultimate security is feeble. With his constant diversion in Bulgaria, we may contrive here to struggle into success. You sometimes laugh at my sanguine temper, Nicæus. To say the truth, I am more serene than sanguine, and was never more conscious of the strength of my opponent than now, when it appears that I have beaten him. Hark! the people cheer. I love the people, Nicæus, who are ever influenced by genuine and generous feelings. They cheer as if they had once more gained a country. Alas! they little know what they must endure even at the best. Nay! look not gloomy; we have done great things, and will do more. Who waits without there? Demetrius! Call the messenger from Lord Hunniades."

An Epirot bearing a silken packet was now introduced, which he delivered to Iskander. Reverently touching the hand of his chieftain, the messenger then kissed his own and withdrew. Iskander broke the seal, and drew forth a letter from the silken cover.

"So! this is well!" exclaimed the prince with great animation, as he threw his quick eye over the letter. "As I hoped and deemed, a most complete victory. Karam Bey himself a prisoner, baggage, standards, great guns, treasure. Brave soldier of the cross! (may I prove so)! Your perfectly devised movement, (poh, poh)! Hah! what is this?" exclaimed Iskander, turning pale; his lip quivered, his eye looked dim. He walked to an arched window. His companion, who supposed that he was reading, did not disturb him.

"Poor, poor Hunniades!" at length exclaimed Iskander, shaking his head.

"What of him?" inquired Nicæus quickly.

"The sharpest accident of war!" replied Iskander. "It quite clouds my spirit. We must forget these things, we must forget. Epirus! he is not a patriot who can spare a thought from thee. And yet, so young, so beautiful, so gifted, so worthy of a hero!—when I saw her by her great father's side, sharing his toils, aiding his councils, supplying his necessities, methought I gazed upon a ministering angel!—upon—”

“ Stop, stop in mercy's name, Iskander!” exclaimed Nicæus in a very agitated tone. “ What is all this? Surely no,—surely not—surely Iduna—!”

“ 'Tis she!”

“ Dead?” exclaimed Nicæus rushing up to his companion, and seizing his arm.

“ Worse, much worse!”

“ God of heaven!” exclaimed the young prince with almost a frantic air. “ Tell me all, tell me all! This suspense fires my brain. Iskander, you know not what this woman is to me—the sole object of my being, the bane, the blessing of my life! Speak, dear friend, speak! I beseech you! where is Iduna?”

“ A prisoner to the Turk.”

“ Iduna a prisoner to the Turk! I'll not believe it! Why do we wear swords? Where's chivalry? Iduna, a prisoner to the Turk! 'Tis false. It cannot be. Iskander, you are a coward! I am a coward! All are cowards! A prisoner to the Turk! Iduna! What, the rose of Christendom! has it been plucked by such a turbaned dog as Amurath? Farewell, Epirus! Farewell, classic Athens! Farewell, bright fields of Greece, and dreams that made them brighter! The sun of all my joy and hope is set, and set for ever!”

So saying, Nicæus, tearing his hair and garments, flung himself upon the floor, and hid his face in his robes.

Iskander paced the room with a troubled step and thoughtful brow. After some minutes he leant down by the prince of Athens, and endeavoured to console him.

“It is vain, Iskander, it is in vain,” said Nicæus. “I wish to die.”

“Were I a favoured lover, in such a situation,” replied Iskander, “I should scarcely consider death my duty, unless the sacrifice of myself preserved my mistress.”

“Hah !” exclaimed Nicæus, starting from the ground. “Do you conceive then, the possibility of rescuing her ?”

“If she live, she is a prisoner in the seraglio at Adrianople. You are as good a judge as myself of the prospect that awaits your exertions. It is, without doubt, a difficult adventure, but such, methinks, as a Christian knight should scarcely shun.”

“To horse,” exclaimed Nicæus, “to horse—and yet what can I do ? Were she in any other place but the capital I might rescue her by force, but in the heart of their empire—it is impossible. Is there no ransom that can tempt the Turk ? My principality would rise in the balance beside this jewel.”

“That were scarcely wise, and certainly not just,” replied Iskander ; “but ransom will be of no avail. Hunniades has already offered to restore Karam Bey, and all the prisoners of rank, and the chief trophies, and Amurath has refused to listen to any terms. The truth is, Iduna has found favour in the eyes of his son, the young Mahomed.”

“Holy Virgin ! hast thou no pity on this Christian maid ?” exclaimed Nicæus. “The young Mahomed ! Shall this licentious infidel—ah ! Iskander, dear, dear Iskander, you who have so much wisdom, and so much courage ; you who can devise all things, and dare all things ; help me, help me ; on my knees I do beseech you, take up this crying cause of foul oppression, and for the sake of all you love and reverence—your creed, your country, and perchance your friend, let your great genius, like some solemn angel, haste to the rescue of the sweet Iduna, and save her, save her!"

"Some thoughts like these were rising in my mind when first I spoke," replied Iskander. "This is a better cue, far more beseeming princes than boyish tears, and all the outward misery of wo, a tattered garment and dishevelled locks. Come, Nicæus, we have to struggle with a mighty fortune. Let us be firm as fate itself."

VIII.

Immediately after his interview with Nicæus, Iskander summoned some of the chief citizens of Croia to the citadel, and submitting to them his arrangements for the administration of Epirus, announced the necessity of his instant departure for a short interval; and the same evening, ere the moon had risen, himself and the prince of Athens quitted the city, and proceeded in the direction of Adrianople. They travelled with great rapidity until they reached a small town upon the frontiers, where they halted for one day. Here, in the bazaar, Iskander purchased for himself the dress of an Armenian physician. In his long dark robes, and large round cap of black wool, his face and hands stained, and his beard and mustachios shaven, it seemed impossible that he could be recognized. Nicæus was habited as his page, in a dress of coarse red cloth, setting tight to his form, with a red cap, with a long blue tassel. He carried a large bag containing drugs, some surgical instruments, and a few books. In this guise, as soon as the gates were open on the morrow, Iskander, mounted on a very small mule, and Nicæus on a very large donkey, the two princes commenced the pass of the mountainous range, an arm of the Balkan which divided Epirus from Roumelia.

"I broke the wind of the finest charger in all Asia when I last ascended these mountains," said Iskander; "I hope this day's journey may be accepted as a sort of atonement."

"Faith! there is little doubt I am the best mounted of the two," said Nicæus. "However, I hope we shall return at a sharper pace."

"How came it, my Nicæus," said Iskander, "that you never mentioned to me the name of Iduna when we were at Athens? I little supposed when I made my sudden visit to Hunniades, that I was about to appeal to so fair a host. She is a rarely gifted lady."

"I knew of her being at the camp as little as yourself," replied the prince of Athens, "and for the rest, the truth is, Iskander, there are some slight crosses in our loves which time, I hope, will fashion rightly." So saying, Nicæus pricked on his donkey, and flung his stick at a bird which was perched on the branch of a tree. Iskander did not resume a topic to which his companion seemed disinclined. Their journey was tedious. Towards nightfall they reached the summit of the usual track; and as the descent was difficult, they were obliged to rest until day-break.

On the morrow they had a magnificent view of the rich plains of Roumelia, and in the extreme distance, the great city of Adrianople, its cupolas and minarets blazing and sparkling in the sun. This glorious prospect at once revived all their energies. It seemed that the moment of peril and of fate had arrived. They pricked on their sorry steeds; and on the morning of the next day, presented themselves at the gates of the city. The thorough knowledge which Iskander possessed of the Turkish character, obtained them an entrance, which was at one time almost doubtful, from the irritability and impatience of Nicæus. They repaired to a caravansera of good repute in the neighbourhood of the seraglio ; and having engaged their rooms, the Armenian physician, attended by his page, visited several of the neighbouring coffee-houses, announcing, at the same time, his arrival, his profession, and his skill.

As Iskander felt pulses, examined tongues, and distributed drugs and charms, he listened with interest and amusement to the conversation of which he himself was often the hero. He found that the Turks had not yet recovered from their consternation at his audacity and success. They were still wondering, and if possible more astounded than indignant. The politicians of the coffee-houses, chiefly consisting of Janissaries, were loud in their murmurs. The popularity of Amurath had vanished before the triumph of Hunniades, and the rise of Iskander.

“ But Allah has in some instances favoured the faithful,” remarked Iskander ; “ I heard in my travels of your having captured a great princess of the giaours ?”

“ God is great !” said an elderly Turk with a long white beard. “ The hakim congratulates the faithful because they have taken a woman !”

“ Not so, merely,” replied Iskander ; “ I heard the woman was a princess. If so, the people of Franguestan will pay any ransom for their great women ; and, by giving up this fair giaour, you may free many of the faithful.”

“ Mashallah !” said another ancient Turk, sipping his coffee. “ The hakim speaks wisely.”

“ May I murder my mother !” exclaimed a young Janissary, with great indignation. "But this is the very thing that makes me wild against Amurath. Is not this princess a daughter of that accursed giaour, that dog of dogs, Hunniades? and has he not offered for her ransom our brave Karam Bey himself, and his chosen warriors? and has not Amurath said nay? And why has he said nay? Because his son, the prince Mahomed, instead of fighting against the giaours, has looked upon one of their women, and has become a Mejnoun. Pah! May I murder my mother,—but if the giaours were in full march to the city, I'd not fight. And let him tell this to the cadı who dares; for there are ten thousand of us, and we have sworn by the kettle—but we will not fight for giaours, or those who love giaours!"

"If you mean me, Ali, about going to the cadı," said the chief eunuch of Mahomed, who was standing by, "let me tell you I am no tale-bearer, and scorn to do an unmanly act. The young prince can beat the giaours without the aid of those who are noisy enough in a coffee-house, when they are quiet enough in the field. And, for the rest of the business, you may all ease your hearts; for the frangy princess you talk of, is pining away, and will soon die. The sultan has offered a hundred purses of gold to any one who cures her; but the gold will never be counted by the Hasnadar, or I will double it."

"Try your fortune, hakim," said several laughing loungers to Iskander.

"Allah has stricken the frangy princess," said the old Turk with a white beard.

"He will strike all giaours," said his ancient companion, sipping his coffee. "'Tis so written."

"Well! I do not like to hear of women-slaves pinning to death," said the young Janissary, in a softened tone, "particularly when they are young. Amurath should have ransomed her, or he might have given her to one of his officers, or any young fellow that had particularly distinguished himself." And so, twirling his mustachios, and flinging down his piastre, the young Janissary strutted out of the coffee-house.

"When we were young," said the old Turk with the white beard to his companion, shaking his head, "when we were young——"

"We conquered Anatolia, and never opened our mouths," rejoined his companion.

"I never offered an opinion till I was sixty," said the old Turk; "and then it was one which had been in our family for a century."

"No wonder Hunniades carries every thing before him," said his companion.

"And that accursed Iskander," said the old man.

The chief eunuch, finishing his vase of sherbet, moved away. The Armenian physician followed him.

IX.

The chief eunuch turned into a burial-ground, through which a way led, by an avenue of cypress-trees, to the quarter of the seraglio. The Armenian physician, accompanied by his page, followed him.

"Noble sir!" said the Armenian physician; "may I trespass for a moment on your lordship's attention?"

"Worthy hakim, is it you?" replied the chief eunuch, turning round with an encouraging smile of courteous condescension,—“your pleasure?”

“I would speak to you of important matters,” said the physician.

The eunuch carelessly seated himself on a richly-carved tomb, and crossing his legs with an air of pleasant superiority, adjusted a fine emerald that sparkled on his finger, and bade the hakim address him without hesitation.

“I am a physician,” said the Armenian.

The eunuch nodded.

“And I heard your lordship in the coffee-house mention that the sultan, our sublime master, had offered a rich reward to any one who could effect the cure of a favourite captive.”

“No less a reward than one hundred purses of gold,” remarked the eunuch. “The reward is proportioned to the exigency of the case. Believe me, worthy sir, it is desperate.”

“With mortal means,” replied the Armenian; “but I possess a talisman of magical influence, which no disorder can resist. I would fain try its efficacy.”

“This is not the first talisman that has been offered us, worthy doctor,” said the eunuch, smiling incredulously.

“But the first that has been offered on these terms,” said the Armenian. “Let me cure the captive, and of the one hundred purses, a moiety shall belong to yourself. Ay! so confident am I of success, that I deem it no hazard to commence our contract by this surety.” And so saying, the Armenian took from his finger a gorgeous carbuncle, and offered it to the eunuch. The worthy dependant of the seraglio had a great taste in jewellery. He examined the stone with admiration, and placed it on his finger with complacency. “I require no inducements to promote the interests of science, and the purposes of charity," said the eunuch, with a patronizing air. "'Tis assuredly a pretty stone, and, as the memorial of an ingenious stranger, whom I respect, I shall, with pleasure, retain it. You were saying something about a talisman. Are you serious? I doubt not that there are means which might obtain you the desired trial; but the prince Mahomed is as violent when displeased or disappointed as munificent when gratified. Cure this Christian captive, and we may certainly receive the promised purses: fail, and your head will as assuredly be flung into the seraglio moat, to say nothing of my own."

"Most noble sir!" said the physician; "I am willing to undertake the experiment on the terms you mention. Rest assured that the patient, if alive, must, with this remedy, speedily recover. You marvel! Believe me, had you witnessed the cures which it has already effected, you would only wonder at its otherwise incredible influence."

"You have the advantage," replied the eunuch, "of addressing a man who has seen something of the world. I travel every year to Anatolia with the prince Mahomed. Were I a narrow-minded bigot, who had never been five miles from Adrianople in the whole course of my life, I might indeed be sceptical. But I am a patron of science, and have heard of talismans. How much might this ring weigh, think you?"

"I have heard it spoken of as a carbuncle of uncommon size," replied the Armenian.

"Where did you say you lodged, hakim?"

"At the khan of Bedreddin."

"A very proper dwelling. Well, we shall see. Have you more jewels? I might, perhaps, put you in the way of parting with some at good prices.

The khan of Bedreddin is very conveniently situated. I may, perhaps, towards evening, taste your coffee at the khan of Bedreddin, and we will talk of this said talisman. Allah be with you, worthy hakim!" The eunuch nodded, not without encouragement, and went his way.

"Anxiety alone enabled me to keep my countenance," said Nicæus. "A patron of science, forsooth! Of all the insolent, shallow-brained, rapacious coxcombs——"

"Hush, my friend!" said Iskander, with a smile. "The chief eunuch of the heir apparent of the Turkish empire is a far greater man than a poor prince, or a proscribed rebel. This worthy can do our business, and I trust will. He clearly bites, and a richer bait will, perhaps, secure him. In the meantime, we must be patient, and remember whose destiny is at stake."

X.

The chief eunuch did not keep the adventurous companions long in suspense; for before the muezzin had announced the close of day from the minarets, he had reached the khan of Bedreddin, and inquired for the Armenian physician.

"We have no time to lose," said the eunuch to Iskander. "Bring with you whatever you may require, and follow me."

The eunuch led the way, Iskander and Nicæus maintaining a respectful distance. After proceeding down several streets, they arrived at the burial-ground, where they had conversed in the morning; and when they had entered this more retired spot, the eunuch fell back, and addressed his companion.

"Now, worthy hakim," he said, "if you deceive me, I will never patronize a man of science again. I found an opportunity of speaking to the prince this afternoon of your talisman, and he has taken from my representations such a fancy for its immediate proof, that I found it quite impossible to postpone its trial even until to-morrow. I mentioned the terms. I told the prince your life was the pledge. I said nothing of the moiety of the reward, worthy hakim. That is an affair between ourselves. I trust to your honour, and I always act thus with men of science."

"I shall not disgrace my profession or your confidence, rest assured," replied Iskander. "And am I to see the captive to-night?"

"I doubt it not. Are you prepared? We might, perhaps, gain a little time, if very necessary."

"By no means, sir; truth is ever prepared."

Thus conversing, they passed through the burial-ground, and approached some high, broad walls, forming a terrace, and planted with young sycamore-trees. The eunuch tapped, with his silver stick, at a small gate, which opened, and admitted them into a garden, full of large clumps of massy shrubs. Through these a winding walk led for some way, and then conducted them to an open lawn, on which was situate a vast and irregular building. As they approached the pile, a young man of very imperious aspect rushed forward from a gate, and abruptly accosted Iskander.

"Are you the Armenian physician?" he inquired.

Iskander bowed assent.

"Have you got your talisman? You know the terms? Cure this Christian girl and you shall name your own reward; fail, and I shall claim your forfeit head."

"The terms are well understood, mighty prince," said Iskander, for the young man was no less a personage than the son of Amurath, and future conqueror of Constantinople; "but I am confident there will be no necessity for the terror of Christendom claiming any other heads than those of his enemies."

"Kafis will conduct you at once to your patient," said Mahomed. "For myself, I cannot rest until I know the result of your visit. I shall wander about these gardens, and destroy the flowers, which is the only pleasure now left me."

Kafis motioned to his companions to advance, and they entered the seraglio.

At the end of a long gallery they came to a great portal, which Kafis opened, and Iskander and Nicæus for a moment supposed that they had arrived at the chief hall of the tower of Babel, but they found the shrill din only proceeded from a large company of women, who were employed in distilling the rare atar of the jasmine flower. All their voices ceased on the entrance of the strangers, as if by a miracle; but when they had examined them, and observed that it was only a physician and his boy, their awe, or their surprise, disappeared; and they crowded round Iskander, some holding out their wrists, others lolling out their tongues, and some asking questions, which perplexed alike the skill and the modesty of the adventurous dealer in magical medicine. The annoyance, however, was not of great duration, for Kafis so belaboured their fair shoulders with his official baton, that they instantly retreated with precipitation, uttering the most violent shrieks, and bestowing on the eunuch so many titles, that Iskander and his page were quite astounded at the intuitive knowledge which the imprisoned damsels possessed of that vocabulary of abuse, which is in general mastered only by the experience of active existence.

Quitting this chamber, the eunuch and his companions ascended a lofty staircase. They halted, at length, before a door. "This is the chamber of the tower," said their guide, "and here we shall find the fair captive." He knocked, the door was opened by a female slave, and Iskander and Nicæus, with an anxiety they could with difficulty conceal, were ushered into a small but sumptuous apartment. In the extremity was a recess covered with a light gauzy curtain. The eunuch bidding them keep in the back-ground, advanced, and cautiously withdrawing the curtain slightly aside, addressed some words in a low voice to the inmate of the recess. In a few minutes the eunuch beckoned to Iskander to advance, and whispered to him: "She would not at first see you, but I have told her you are a Christian, the more the pity, and she consents." So saying, he withdrew the curtain, and exhibited a veiled female figure lying on a couch.

"Noble lady," said the physician in Greek, which he had ascertained the eunuch did not comprehend; "pardon the zeal of a Christian friend. Though habited in this garb, I have served under your illustrious sire. I should deem my life well spent in serving the daughter of the great Henniades."

"Kind stranger," replied the captive, "I was ill-prepared for such a meeting. I thank you for your sympathy, but my sad fortunes are beyond human aid."

"God works by humble instruments, noble lady," said Iskander, "and with his blessing we may yet prosper."

"I fear that I must look to death as my only refuge," replied Iduna, "and still more, I fear that it is not so present a refuge as my oppressors themselves imagine. But you are a physician; tell me then how speedily nature will make me free."

She held forth her hand, which Iskander took and involuntarily pressed. "Noble lady," he said, "my skill is a mere pretence to enter these walls. The only talisman I bear with me is a message from your friends."

"Indeed!" said Iduna, in a very agitated tone.

"Restrain yourself, noble lady," said Iskander, interposing, "restrain yourself. Were you any other but the daughter of Hunniades, I would not have ventured upon this perilous exploit. But I know that the lady Iduna has inherited something more than the name of her great ancestors—their heroic soul. If ever there were a moment in her life in which it behoved her to exert all her energies, that moment has arrived. The physician who addresses her, and his attendant who waits at hand, are two of the lady Iduna's most devoted friends. There is nothing that they will not hazard to effect her delivery; and they have matured a plan of escape which they are sanguine must succeed. Yet its completion will require, on her part, great anxiety of mind, greater exertion of body, danger, fatigue, privation. Is the lady Iduna prepared for all this endurance, and all this hazard?"

"Noble friend," replied Iduna, "for I cannot deem you a stranger, and none but a most chivalric knight could have entered upon this almost forlorn adventure; you have not, I trust, miscalculated my character. I am a slave, and unless heaven will interpose, must soon be a dishonoured one. My freedom and my fame are alike at stake. There is no danger, and no suffering which I will not gladly welcome, provided there be even a remote chance of regaining my liberty and securing my honour."

"You are in the mind I counted on. Now, mark my words, dear lady. Seize an opportunity this evening of expressing to your gaolers that you have already experienced some benefit from my visit, and announce your rising confidence in my skill. In the meantime I will make such a report that our daily meetings will not be difficult. For the present, farewell. The prince Mahomed waits without, and I would exchange some words with him before I go."

"And must we part without my being acquainted with the generous friends to whom I am indebted for an act of devotion which almost reconciles me to my sad fate?" said Iduna. "You will not, perhaps, deem the implicit trust reposed in you by one whom you have no interest to deceive, and who, if deceived, cannot be placed in a worse position than she at present fills, as a very gratifying mark of confidence, yet that trust is reposed in you; and let me, at least, soothe the galling dreariness of my solitary hours, by the recollection of the friends to whom I am indebted for a deed of friendship which has filled me with a feeling of wonder from which I have not yet recovered."

"The person who has penetrated the seraglio of Constantinople in disguise to rescue the lady Iduna," answered Iskander, "is the prince Nicæus."

"Nicæus!" exclaimed Iduna, in an agitated tone. "The voice to which I listen is surely not that of the prince Nicæus; nor the form on which I gaze," she added, as she unveiled. Beside her stood the tall figure of the Armenian physician. She beheld his swarthy and unrecognized countenance. She cast her dark eyes around with an air of beautiful perplexity.

"I am a friend of the prince Nicæus," said the physician. "He is here. Shall he advance? Alexis," called out Iskander, not waiting for her reply. The page of the physician came forward, but the eunuch accompanied him. "All is right," said Iskander to Kafis. "We are sure of our hundred purses. But, without doubt, with any other aid, the case were desperate."

"There is but one God," said the eunuch, polishing his carbuncle, with a visage radiant as the gem. "I never repented patronizing men of science. The prince waits without. Come along!" He took Iskander by the arm. "Where is your boy? What are you doing there, sir," inquired the eunuch, sharply, of Nicæus, who was tarrying behind, and kissing the hand of Iduna.

"I was asking the lady for a favour to go to the coffee-house with," replied Nicæus, with pouting lips; "you forget that I am to have none of the hundred purses."

"True," said the eunuch; "there is something in that. Here, boy, here is a piastre for you. I like to encourage men of science, and all that belong to them. Do not go and spend it all in one morning, boy, and when the fair captive is cured, if you remind me, boy, perhaps I may give you another."

XI.

Kafis and his charge again reached the garden. The twilight was nearly past. A horseman galloped up to them, followed by several running footmen. It was the prince.

“Well, hakim,” he inquired, in his usual abrupt style, “can you cure her?”

“Yes,” answered Iskander, firmly.

“Now listen, hakim,” said Mahomed. “I must very shortly leave the city, and proceed into Epirus at the head of our troops. I have sworn two things, and I have sworn them by the holy stone. Ere the new moon, I will have the heart of Iduna and the head of Iskander!”

The physician bowed.

“If you can so restore the health of this frangy girl,” continued Mahomed, “that she may attend me within ten days into Epirus, you shall claim from my treasury what sum you like, and become physician to the seraglio. What say you?”

“My hope and my belief is,” replied Iskander, “that within ten days she may breathe the air of Epirus.”

“By my father’s beard, you are a man after my own heart,” exclaimed the prince; “and since thou dealest in talismans, hakim, can you give me a charm that will secure me a meeting with this Epirot rebel within the term, so that I may keep my oath. What say you?—what say you?”

“There are such spells,” replied Iskander. “But mark, I can only secure the meeting, not the head.”

“That is my part,” said Mahomed, with an arrogant sneer. “But the meeting, the meeting?”

“You know the fountain of Kallista in Epirus. Its virtues are renowned.”

“I have heard of it.”

“Plunge your scimeter in its midnight waters thrice, on the eve of the new moon, and each time summon the enemy you would desire to meet. He will not fail you."

"If you cure the captive, I will credit the legend, and keep the appointment," replied Mahomed, thoughtfully.

"I have engaged to do that," replied the physician.

"Well, then, I shall redeem my pledge," said the prince.

"But mind," said the physician, "while I engage to cure the lady and produce the warrior, I can secure your highness neither the heart of the one nor the head of the other."

"'Tis understood," said Mahomed.

XII.

The Armenian physician did not fail to attend his captive patient at an early hour on the ensuing morn. His patron Kafis received him with an encouraging smile. "The talisman already works," said the eunuch: "she has past a good night, and confesses to an improvement. Our purses are safe. Methinks I already count the gold. But I say, worthy hakim, come hither, come hither," and Kafis looked around to be sure that no one was within hearing. "I say," and here he put on a very mysterious air indeed, "the prince is generous: you understand? We go shares. We shall not quarrel. I never yet repented patronizing a man of science, and I am sure I never shall. The prince you see is violent, but generous. I would not cure her too soon, eh?"

"You take a most discreet view of affairs," responded Iskander, with an air of complete assent, and they entered the chamber of the tower.

Iduna performed her part with great dexterity ; but indeed it required less skill than herself and her advisers had at first imagined. Her malady, although it might have ended fatally, was in its origin entirely mental, and the sudden prospect of freedom, and of restoration to her country and her family, at a moment when she had delivered herself up to despair, afforded her a great and instantaneous benefit. She could not indeed sufficiently restrain her spirits, and smiled incredulously when Iskander mentioned the impending exertion and fatigues with doubt and apprehension. His anxiety to return immediately to Epirus, determined him to adopt the measures for her rescue without loss of time, and on his third visit, he prepared her for making the great attempt on the ensuing morn. Hitherto Iskander had refrained from revealing himself to Iduna. He was induced to adopt this conduct by various considerations. He could no longer conceal from himself that the daughter of Hunniades exercised an influence over his feelings which he was unwilling to encourage. His sincere friendship for Nicæus, and his conviction that it was his present duty to concentrate all his thought and affection in the cause of his country, would have rendered him anxious to have resisted any emotions of the kind, even could he have flattered himself that there was any chance of their being returned by the object of his rising passion. But Iskander was as modest as he was brave and gifted. The disparity of age between himself and Iduna appeared an insuperable barrier to his hopes, even had there been no other obstacle. Iskander struggled with his love, and with his strong mind the struggle, though painful, was not without success.

He felt that he was acting in a manner which must ultimately tend to the advantage of his country, the happiness of his friend, and perhaps the maintenance of his own self-respect. For he had too much pride not to be very sensible to the bitterness of rejection.

Had he perceived more indications of a very cordial feeling subsisting between Nicæus and Iduna, he would perhaps not have persisted in maintaining his disguise. But he had long suspected that the passion of the prince of Athens was not too favourably considered by the daughter of Hunniades, and he was therefore exceedingly anxious that Nicæus should possess all the credit of the present adventure, which Iskander scarcely doubted, if successful, would allow Nicæus to urge irresistible claims to the heart of a mistress whom he had rescued at the peril of his life from slavery and dishonour, to offer rank, reputation, and love. Iskander took, therefore, several opportunities of leading Iduna to believe that he was merely a confidential agent of Nicæus, and that the whole plan of her rescue from the seraglio of Adrianople had been planned by his young friend. In the mean time, during the three days on which they had for short intervals met, very few words had been interchanged between Nicæus and his mistress. Those words, indeed, had been to him of the most inspiring nature, and expressed such a deep sense of gratitude, and such lively regard, that Nicæus could no longer resist the delightful conviction that he had at length created a permanent interest in her heart. Often he longed to rush to her couch, and press her hand to his lips. Even the anticipation of future happiness could not prevent him from envying the good fortune of Iskander, who was allowed to converse with her without restraint; and bitterly, on their return to the khan, did he execrate the pompous eunuch for all the torture which he occasioned him by his silly conversation, and the petty tyranny of office with which Kaffis always repressed his attempts to converse for a moment with Iduna.

In the mean time all Adrianople sounded with the preparations for the immediate invasion of Epirus, and the return of Iskander to his country became each hour more urgent. Every thing being prepared, the adventurers determined on the fourth morning to attempt the rescue. They repaired as usual to the serail, and were attended by Kaffis to the chamber of the tower, who congratulated Iskander on their way on the rapid convalescence of the captive. When they had fairly entered the chamber, the physician being somewhat in advance, Nicæus, who was behind, commenced proceedings by knocking down the eunuch, and Iskander instantly turning round to his assistance, they succeeded in gagging and binding the alarmed and astonished Kaffis. Iduna then habited herself in a costume exactly similar to that worn by Nicæus, and which her friends had brought to her in their bag. Iskander and Iduna then immediately quitted the serail without notice or suspicion, and hurried to the khan, where they mounted their horses, that were in readiness, and hastened without a moment's loss of time to a fountain without the gates, where they awaited the arrival of Nicæus with anxiety. After remaining a few minutes in the chamber of the tower, the prince of Athens stole out, taking care to secure the door upon Kaffis. He descended the staircase, and escaped through the serail without meeting any one, and had nearly reached the gate of the gardens, when he was challenged by some of the eunuch guard at a little distance.

"Hilloa!" exclaimed one, "I thought you passed just now?"

"So I did," replied Nicæus with nervous effrontery; "but I came back for my bag, which I left behind," and giving them no time to reflect, he pushed his way through the gate with all the impudence of a page. He rushed through the burial ground, hurried through the streets, mounted his horse, and galloped through the gates. Iskander and Iduna were in sight, he waved his hand for them at once to proceed, and in a moment, without exchanging a word, they were all galloping at full speed, nor did they breathe their horses until sunset.

By nightfall they had reached a small wood of chestnut trees, where they rested for two hours, more for the sake of their steeds than their own refreshment, for anxiety prevented Iduna from indulging in any repose, as much as excitement prevented her from feeling any fatigue. Iskander lit a fire and prepared their rough meal, unharnessed the horses, and turned them out to their pasture. Nicæus made Iduna a couch of fern, and supported her head, while, in deference to his entreaties, she endeavoured in vain to sleep. Before midnight they were again on their way, and proceeded at a rapid pace towards the mountains, until a few hours before noon, when their horses began to sink under the united influence of their previous exertions and the increasing heat of the day. Iskander looked serious, and often threw a backward glance in the direction of Adrianople.

"We must be beyond pursuit," said Nicæus. "I dare say poor Kafis is still gagged and bound."

"Could we but once reach the mountains," replied his companion, "I should have little fear, but I counted upon our steeds carrying us there without faltering. We cannot reckon upon more than three hours' start, prince. Our friend Kaffis is too important a personage to be long missed."

"The holy Virgin befriend us!" said the lady Iduna. "I can urge my poor horse no more."

They had now ascended a small rising ground, which gave them a wide prospect over the plain. Iskander halted and threw an anxious glance around him.

"There are some horsemen in the distance whom I do not like," said the physician.

"I see them," said Nicæus; "travellers like ourselves."

"Let us die sooner than be taken," said Iduna.

"Move on," said the physician, "and let me observe these horsemen alone. I would there were some forest at hand. In two hours we may gain the mountains."

The daughter of Hunniades and the prince of Athens descended the rising ground. Before them, but at a considerable distance, was a broad and rapid river, crossed by a ruinous Roman bridge. The opposite bank of the river was the termination of a narrow plain, which led immediately to the mountains.

"Fair Iduna, you are safe," said the prince of Athens.

"Dear Nicæus," replied his companion, "imagine what I feel. It is too wild a moment to express my gratitude."

"I trust that Iduna will never express her gratitude to Nicæus," answered the prince; "it is not, I assure you, a favourite word with him."

Their companion rejoined them, urging his wearied horse to its utmost speed.

"Nicæus!" he called out, "halt!"

They stopped their willing horses.

“How now! my friend,” said the prince; “you look grave?”

“Lady Iduna!” said the Armenian, “we are pursued.”

Hitherto the prospect of success, and the consciousness of the terrible destiny that awaited failure, had supported Iduna under exertions, which under any other circumstances must have proved fatal. But to learn, at the very moment that she was congratulating herself on the felicitous completion of their daring enterprise, that that dreaded failure was absolutely impending, demanded too great an exertion of her exhausted energies. She turned pale; she lifted up her imploring hands and eyes to heaven in speechless agony, and then bending down her head, wept with unrestrained and harrowing violence. The distracted Nicæus sprung from his horse, endeavoured to console the almost insensible Iduna, and then wofully glancing at his fellow adventurer, wrung his hands in despair.—His fellow adventurer seemed lost in thought.

“They come,” said Nicæus, starting; “methinks I see one on the brow of the hill. Away! fly! Let us at least die fighting. Dear, dear Iduna, would that my life could ransom thine. O God! this is indeed agony.”

“Escape is impossible,” said Iduna, in a tone of calmness which astonished them. “They must overtake us. Alas! brave friends, I have brought ye to this! Pardon me, pardon me! I am ashamed of my selfish grief. Ascribe it to other causes than a narrow spirit and a weak mind. One course is alone left to us. We must not be taken prisoners. Ye are warriors, and can die as such. I am only a woman, but I am the daughter of Hunniades. Nicæus, you are my father’s friend; I beseech you sheathe your dagger in my breast.”

The prince in silent agony pressed his hands to his sight. His limbs quivered with terrible emotion. Suddenly he advanced and threw himself at the feet of his hitherto silent comrade. "Oh! Iskander!" exclaimed Nicæus, "great and glorious friend! my head and heart are both too weak for these awful trials—save her, save her!"

"Iskander!" exclaimed the thunderstruck Iduna. "Iskander!"

"I have, indeed, the misfortune to be Iskander, beloved lady," he replied. "This is, indeed, a case almost of desperation, but if I have to endure more than most men, I have, to inspire me, influences which fall to the lot of few—yourself and Epirus. Come! Nicæus, there is but one chance—we must gain the bridge." Thus speaking, Iskander caught Iduna in his arms, and remounting his steed, and followed by the prince of Athens, hurried towards the river.

"The water is not fordable," said Iskander, when they had arrived at its bank. "The bridge I shall defend; and it will go hard if I do not keep them at bay long enough for you and Iduna to gain the mountains. Away; think no more of me; nay! no tear, dear lady, or you will unman me. An inspiring smile, and all will go well. Hasten to Croia, and let nothing tempt you to linger in the vicinity, with the hope of my again joining you. Believe me, we shall meet again, but act upon what I say, as if they were my dying words. God bless you, Nicæus! No murmuring. For once let the physician, indeed, command his page.—Gentle lady, commend me to your father. Would I had such a daughter in Epirus, to head my trusty brethren if I fall! Tell the great Hunniades, my legacy to him is my country. Farewell, farewell!"

"I will not say farewell," exclaimed Iduna, "I too can fight. I will stay and die with you."

“See, they come! Believe me I shall conquer. Fly, fly, thou noble girl? Guard her well, Nicæus. God bless thee, boy! Live and be happy. Nay, nay, not another word. The farther ye are both distant, trust me, the stronger will be my arm. Indeed, indeed, I do beseech ye, fly!”

Nicæus placed the weeping Iduna in her saddle, and after leading her horse over the narrow and broken bridge, mounted his own, and then they ascended together the hilly and winding track. Iskander watched them as they went. Often Iduna waved her kerchief to her forlorn champion. In the meantime Iskander tore off his Armenian robes and flung them into the river, tried his footing on the position he had taken up, stretched his limbs, examined his daggers, flourished his scimeter.

The bridge would only permit a single rider to pass abreast. It was supported by three arches, the centre one of very considerable size, the others small, and rising out of the shallow water on each side. In many parts the parapet wall was broken, in some even the pathway was almost impassable, from the masses of fallen stone and the dangerous fissures. In the centre of the middle arch was an immense key-stone, on which was sculptured, in high relief, an enormous helmet, which indeed gave among the people of the country, a title to the bridge.

A band of horsemen dashed at full speed, with a loud shout, down the hill. They checked their horses, when to their astonishment they found Iskander with his drawn scimeter, prepared to resist their passage. But they paused only for a moment, and immediately attempted to swim the river. But their exhausted horses drew back with a strong instinct from the rushing waters: one of the band alone, mounted on a magnificent black mare, succeeding in his purpose. The rider was half-way in the stream, his high-bred steed snorting and struggling in the strong current. Iskander, with the same ease as if he were plucking the ripe fruit from a tree, took up a ponderous stone, and hurled it with fatal precision at his adventurous enemy. The rider shrieked and fell, and rose no more: the mare, relieved from her burthen, exerted all her failing energies, and succeeded in gaining the opposite bank. There, rolling herself in the welcome pasture, and neighing with a note of triumph, she revelled in her hard escape.

“Cut down the giaour!” exclaimed one of the horsemen, and he dashed at the bridge. His fragile blade shivered into a thousand pieces as it crossed the scimeter of Iskander, and in a moment his bleeding head fell over the parapet.

Instantly the whole band, each emulous of revengeing his comrades, rushed without thought at Iskander, and endeavoured to overpower him by their irresistible charge. His scimeter flashed like lightning. The two foremost of his enemies fell, but the impulse of the numbers prevailed, and each instant, although dealing destruction with every blow, he felt himself losing ground. At length he was on the centre of the centre arch, an eminent position, which allowed him for a moment to keep them at bay, and gave him breathing time. Suddenly he made a desperate charge, clove the head of the leader of the band in two, and beat them back several yards; then swiftly returning to his former position, he summoned all his supernatural strength, and stamping on the mighty, but mouldering keystone, he forced it from its form, and broke the masonry of a thousand years. Amid a loud and awful shriek, horses and horsemen, and the dissolving fragments of the scene for a moment mingled as it were in airy chaos, and then plunged with a horrible plash into the fatal depths below. Some fell, and, stunned by the massy fragments, rose no more; others struggled again into light, and gained with difficulty their old shore. Amid them, Iskander, unhurt, swam like a river god, and stabbed to the heart the only strong swimmer that was making his way in the direction of Epirus. Drenched and exhausted, Iskander at length stood upon the opposite margin, and wrang his garments, while he watched the scene of strange destruction.

Three or four exhausted wretches were lying bruised and breathless on the opposite bank: one drowned horse was stranded near them, caught by the rushes. Of all that brave company the rest had vanished, and the broad, and blue, and sunny waters rushed without a shadow beneath the two remaining arches.

"Iduna! thou art safe," exclaimed Iskander. "Now for Epirus!" So saying, he seized the black mare, renovated by her bath and pasture, and vaulting on her back, was in a few minutes bounding over his native hills.

XIII.

In the meantime let us not forget the prince of Athens and the lady Iduna. These adventurous companions soon lost sight of their devoted champion, and entered a winding ravine, which gradually brought them to the summit of the first chain of the Epirot mountains. From it they looked down upon a vast and rocky valley, through which several mule tracks led in various directions, and entered the highest barrier of the mountains which rose before them, covered with forests of chestnut and ilex. Nicæus chose the track which he considered least tempting to pursuit, and towards sunset they had again entered a ravine washed by a mountain stream. The course of the waters had made the earth fertile and beautiful. Wild shrubs of gay and pleasant colours refreshed their wearied eye-sight, and the perfume of aromatic plants invigorated their jaded senses. Upon the bank, too, of the river, a large cross of roughly carved wood brought comfort to their Christian hearts, and while the holy emblem filled them with hope and consolation, and seemed an omen of refuge from their Moslemin oppressors, a venerable eremite, with a long white beard descending over his dark robes, and leaning on a staff of thorn, came forth from an adjoining cavern to breathe the evening air and pour forth his evening orisons.

Iduna and Nicæus had hitherto prosecuted their sorrowful journey almost in silence. Exhausted with anxiety, affliction and bodily fatigue, with difficulty the daughter of Hunniades could preserve her seat upon her steed. One thought alone interested her, and by its engrossing influence maintained her under all sufferings—the memory of Iskander. Since she first met him, at the extraordinary interview in her father's pavilion, often had the image of the hero recurred to her fancy, often had she mused over his great qualities and strange career. His fame, so dangerous to female hearts, was not diminished by his presence. And now, when Iduna recollected that she was indebted to him for all that she held dear, that she owed to his disinterested devotion, not only life, but all that renders life desirable,—honour and freedom, country and kindred,—that image was invested with associations and with sentiments, which, had Iskander himself been conscious of their existence, would have lent redoubled vigour to his arm, and fresh inspiration to his energy. More than once Iduna had been on the point of inquiring of Nicæus the reason which had induced alike him and Iskander to preserve so strictly the disguise of his companion. But a feeling which she did not choose to analyze, struggled successfully with her curiosity: she felt a reluctance to speak of Iskander to the prince of Athens. In the meantime Nicæus himself was not apparently very anxious of conversing upon the subject, and after the first rapid expressions of fear and hope as to the situation of their late comrade, they relapsed into silence, seldom broken by Nicæus, but to deplore the sufferings of his mistress,—lamentations which Iduna answered with a faint smile.

The refreshing scene wherein they had now entered, and the cheering appearance of the hermit were subjects of mutual congratulation, and Nicæus, somewhat advancing, claimed the attention of the holy man, announcing their faith, imprisonment, escape and sufferings, and entreating hospitality and refuge. The hermit pointed with his staff to the winding path, which ascended the bank of the river to the cavern, and welcomed the pilgrims in the name of their blessed Saviour to his wild abode and simple fare.

The cavern widened when they entered, and comprised several small apartments. It was a work of the early Christians, who had found a refuge in their days of persecution, and art had completed the beneficent design of nature. The cavern was fresh, and sweet and clean. Heaven smiled upon its pious inmate through an aperture in the roof; the floor was covered with rushes; in one niche rested a brazen cross, and in another a perpetual lamp burnt before a picture, where Madonna smiled with meek tenderness upon her young divinity.

The eremite placed upon a block of wood, the surface of which he had himself smoothed, some honey, some dried fish, and a wooden bowl filled with the pure stream that flowed beneath them: a simple meal but welcome. His guests seated themselves upon a rushy couch, and while they refreshed themselves, he gently inquired the history of their adventures. As it was evident that the eremite, from her apparel, mistook the sex of Iduna, Nicæus thought fit not to undeceive him, but passed her off as his brother. He described themselves as two Athenian youths, who had been captured while serving as volunteers under the great Hunniades, and who had effected their escape from Adrianople under circumstances of great peril and difficulty; and when he had gratified the eremite's curiosity respecting their Christian brethren in Paynim lands, and sympathetically marvelled with him at the advancing fortunes of the crescent, Nicæus, who perceived that Iduna stood in great need of rest, mentioned the fatigues of his more fragile brother, and requested permission for him to retire. Whereupon the eremite himself, fetching a load of fresh rushes, arranged them in one of the cells, and invited the fair Iduna to repose. The daughter of Hunniades first humbling herself before the altar of the Virgin, and offering her gratitude for all the late mercies vouchsafed unto her, and then bidding a word of peace to her host and her companion, withdrew to her hard-earned couch, and soon was buried in a sleep as sweet and innocent as herself.

But repose fell not upon the eye-lids of Nicæus in spite of all his labours. The heart of the Athenian prince was distracted by the two most powerful of passions—love and jealousy—and when the eremite, pointing out to his guest his allotted resting-place, himself retired to his regular and simple slumbers, Nicæus quitted the cavern, and standing upon the bank of the river, gazed in abstraction upon the rushing waters foaming in the moonlight. The prince of Athens, with many admirable qualities, was one of those men who are influenced only by their passions, and who, in the affairs of life, are invariably guided by their imagination instead of their reason. At present all thought and feeling, all considerations, and all circumstances, merged in the overpowering love he entertained for Iduna, his determination to obtain her at all cost and peril, and his resolution that she should never again meet Iskander, except as the wife of Nicæus. Compared with this paramount object, the future seemed to vanish. The emancipation of his country, the welfare of his friend, even the maintenance of his holy creed, all those great and noble objects for which, under other circumstances, he would have been prepared to sacrifice his fortune and his life, no longer interested or influenced him; and while the legions of the crescent were on the point of pouring into Greece to crush that patriotic and Christian cause over which Iskander and himself had so often mused, whose interests the disinterested absence of Iskander, occasioned solely by his devotion to Nicæus, had certainly endangered, and perhaps, could the events of the last few hours be known, even sacrificed, the prince of Athens resolved, unless Iduna would consent to become his, at once to carry off the daughter of Hunniades to some distant country. Nor, indeed, even with his easily excited vanity, was Nicæus sanguine of obtaining his purpose by less violent means. He was already a rejected suitor, and under circumstances which scarcely had left hope. Nothing but the sole credit of her chivalric rescue could perhaps have obtained for him the interest in the heart of Iduna which he coveted. For while this exploit proffered an irresistible claim to her deepest gratitude, it indicated also, on the part of her deliverer, the presence and possession of all those great qualities, the absence of which in the character and conduct of her suitor, Iduna had not, at a former period, endeavoured to conceal to be the principal cause of his rejection. And now, by the unhappy course of circumstances, the very deed on which he counted, with sanguine hope, as the sure means of his success, seemed as it were to have placed him in a still inferior situation than before. The constant society of his mistress had fanned the flame which, apart from her and hopeless, he had endeavoured to repress, to all its former force and ardour; while, on the other hand, he could not conceal from himself, that Iduna must feel that he had played in these great proceedings but a secondary part; that all the genius and all the generosity of the exploit rested with Iskander, who, after having obtained her freedom by so much energy, peril, sagacity and skill, had secured it by a devoted courage which might shame all the knights of Christendom, perhaps, too, had secured it by his own life.

What if Iskander were no more? It was a great contingency. The eternal servitude of Greece, and the shameful triumph of the crescent, were involved, perhaps, in that single event. And could the possession of Iduna compensate for such disgrace and infamy? Let us not record the wild response of passion.

It was midnight ere the restless Nicæus, more exhausted by his agitating reverie, than by his previous exertions, returned into the cavern, and found refuge in sleep from all his disquietudes.

XIV.

The eremite rose with the sun ; and while he was yet at matins, was joined by Iduna, refreshed and cheerful after her unusual slumbers. After performing their devotions, her venerable host proposed that they should go forth and enjoy the morning air. So, descending the precipitous bank of the river, he led the way to a small glen, the bed of a tributary rivulet, now nearly exhausted. Beautiful clumps of birch-trees, and tall thin poplars, rose on each side among the rock which were covered with bright mosses, and parasitical plants of gay and various colours. One side of the glen was touched with the golden and grateful beams of the rising sun, and the other was in deep shadow.

“Here you can enjoy nature and freedom in security ;” said the eremite, “for your enemies, if they have not already given up their pursuit, will scarcely search this sweet solitude.”

“It is indeed sweet, holy father,” said Iduna ; “but the captive, who has escaped from captivity, can alone feel all its sweetness.”

“It is true,” said the eremite ; “I also have been a captive.”

“Indeed ! holy father. To the infidels ?”

“To the infidels, gentle pilgrim.”

“Have you been at Adrianople ?”

“My oppressors were not the Paynim,” replied the eremite, “but they were enemies far more dire—my own evil passions. Time was when my eye sparkled like thine, gentle pilgrim, and my heart was not as pure."

"God is merciful," said Iduna, "and without his aid, the strongest are but shadows."

"Ever think so," replied the eremite, "and you will deserve rather his love than his mercy. Thirty long years have I spent in this solitude, meditating upon the past, and it is a theme yet fertile in instruction. My hours are never heavy, and memory is to me what action is to other men."

"You have seen much, holy father?"

"And felt more. Yet you will perhaps think the result of all my experience very slight, for I can only say unto thee, trust not in thyself."

"It is a great truth," remarked Iduna, "and leads to a higher one."

"Even so," replied the eremite. "We are full of wisdom in old age, as in winter this river is full of water, but the fire of youth, like the summer sun, dries up the stream."

Iduna did not reply. The eremite attracted her attention to a patch of cresses on the opposite bank of the stream. "Every morn I rise only to discover fresh instances of omnipotent benevolence," he exclaimed. "Yesterday ye tasted my honey and my fish. To-day I can offer ye a fresh dainty. We will break our fast in this pleasant glen. Rest thou here, gentle youth, and I will summon thy brother to our meal. I fear me much he does not bear so contented a spirit as thyself."

"He is older, and has seen more," replied Iduna.

The eremite shook his head, and leaning on his staff, returned to the cavern. Iduna remained, seated on a mossy rock, listening to the awakening birds, and musing over the fate of Iskander. While she was indulging in this reverie, her name was called. She looked up with a blush, and beheld Nicæus.

“How fares my gentle comrade?” inquired the prince of Athens.

“As well as I hope you are, dear Nicæus. We have been indeed fortunate in finding so kind a host.”

“I think I may now congratulate you on your safety,” said the prince. “This unfrequented pass will lead us in two days to Epirus, nor do I indeed now fear pursuit.”

“Acts and not words must express in future how much we owe to you,” said Iduna. “My joy would be complete if my father only knew of our safety, and if our late companion were here to share it.”

“Fear, not for my friend,” replied Nicæus. “I have faith in the fortune of Iskander.”

“If any one could succeed under such circumstances, he doubtless is the man,” rejoined Iduna; “but it was indeed an awful crisis in his fate.”

“Trust me, dear lady, it is wise to banish gloomy thoughts.”

“We can give him only our thoughts,” said Iduna, “and when we remember how much is dependent on his life, can they be cheerful?”

“Mine must be so, when I am in the presence of Iduna;” replied Nicæus.

The daughter of Hunniades gathered moss from the rock, and threw it into the stream.

“Dear lady,” said the prince of Athens, seating himself by her side, and stealing her gentle hand. “Pardon me, if an irrepressible feeling at this moment impels me to recur to a subject, which, I would fain hope, were not so displeasing to you, as once unhappily you deemed it. Oh! Iduna. Iduna, best and dearest, we are once more together; once more I gaze upon that unrivalled form, and listen to the music of that matchless voice. I sought you, I perhaps violated my pledge, but I sought you in captivity and sorrow. Pardon me, pity me, Iduna! Oh! Iduna, if possible, love me!"

She turned away her head, she turned away her streaming eyes. "It is impossible not to love my deliverer," she replied, in a low and tremulous voice, "even could he not prefer the many other claims to affection which are possessed by the prince of Athens. I was not prepared for this renewal of a most painful subject, perhaps under no circumstances; but least of all, under those in which we now find ourselves."

"Alas!" exclaimed the prince; "I can no longer control my passion. My life, not my happiness merely, depends upon Iduna becoming mine. Bear with me, my beloved, bear with me! Were you Nicæus, you too would need forgiveness."

"I beseech you, cease!" exclaimed Iduna, in a firmer voice; and, withdrawing her hand, she suddenly rose. "This is neither the time nor place for such conversation. I have not forgotten that, but a few days back, I was a hopeless captive, and that my life and fame are even now in danger. Great mercies have been vouchsafed to me; but still I perhaps need the hourly interposition of heavenly aid. Other than such worldly thoughts should fill my mind, and do. Dear Nicæus," she continued, in a more soothing tone, "you have nobly commenced a most heroic enterprize: fulfil it in like spirit."

He would have replied; but at this moment, the staff of the eremite sounded among the rocks. Baffled, and dark with rage and passion, the prince of Athens quitted Iduna, and strolled towards the upper part of the glen, to conceal his anger and disappointment.

"Eat, gentle youth," said the eremite.

"Will not thy brother join us? What may be his name?"

"Nicæus, holy father."

"And thine?"

Iduna blushed and hesitated. At length, in her confusion, she replied "Iskander."

"Nicæus!" called out the eremite, "Iskander and myself await thee!"

Iduna trembled. She was agreeably surprised when the prince returned with a smiling countenance, and joined in the meal, with many cheerful words.

"Now, I propose," said the eremite, "that yourself and your brother Iskander should tarry with me some days, if, indeed, my simple fare have any temptation."

"I thank thee, holy father," replied Nicæus, "but our affairs are urgent; nor indeed could I have tarried here at all, had it not been for my young Iskander here, who, as you may easily believe, is little accustomed to his late exertions. But, indeed, towards sunset, we must proceed."

"Bearing with us," added Iduna, "a most grateful recollection of our host."

"God be with ye, wherever ye may proceed," replied the eremite.

"My trust is indeed in him," rejoined Iduna.

XV.

And so, two hours before sunset, mounting their refreshed horses, Nicæus and Iduna quitted, with many kind words, the cavern of the eremite, and took their way along the winding bank of the river. Throughout the moonlit night they travelled, ascending the last and highest chain of mountains, and reaching the summit by dawn. The cheerful light of morning revealed to them the happy plains of a Christian country. With joyful spirits they descended into the fertile land, and stopped at a beautiful Greek village, embowered in orchards and groves of olive-trees.

The prince of Athens instantly inquired for the primate, or chief personage of the village, and was conducted to his house; but its master, he was informed, was without, supervising the commencement of the vintage. Leaving Iduna with the family of the primate, Nicæus went in search of him. The vineyard was full of groups, busied in the most elegant and joyous of human occupations, gathering, with infinite bursts of merriment, the harvest of the vine. Some mounted on ladders, fixed against the festooning branches, plucked the rich bunches, and threw them below, where girls, singing in chorus, caught them in panniers, or their extended drapery. In the centre of the vineyard, a middle-aged man watched with a calm, but vigilant eye, the whole proceedings, and occasionally stimulated the indolent, or prompted the inexperienced.

“Christo!” said the prince of Athens, when he had approached him. The primate turned round, but evidently did not immediately recognize the person who addressed him.

“I see,” continued the prince, “that my meditated caution was unnecessary. My strange garb is a sufficient disguise.”

“The prince Nicæus!” exclaimed the primate.

"He is, indeed, disguised, but will, I am sure, pardon his faithful servant."

"Not a word, Christo!" replied the prince. "To be brief. I have crossed the mountains from Roumelia, and have only within this hour recognized the spot whither I have chanced to arrive. I have a companion with me. I would not be known. You comprehend? Affairs of state. I take it for granted that there are none here who will recognize me, after three years' absence, in this dress."

"You may feel secure, my lord," replied Christo. "If you puzzled me, who have known you since you were no bigger than this bunch of grapes, you will quite confound the rest."

"'Tis well. I shall stay here a day or two, in order to give them an opportunity to prepare for my reception. In the mean time, it is necessary to send on a courier at once. You must manage all this for me, Christo. How are your daughters?"

"So, so, please your highness," replied Christo. "A man with seven daughters has got trouble for every day in the week."

"But not when they are as pretty as your's are?"

"Poh! poh! Handsome is that handsome does; and as for Alexina, she wants to be married."

"Very natural. Let her marry, by all means."

"But Helena wants to do the same."

"More natural still; for, if possible, she is prettier. For my part, I could marry them both."

"Ay, ay! that is all very well; but handsome is that handsome does. I have no objection to Alexina marrying, and even Helena; but then there is Lais——"

"Hah! hah! hah!" exclaimed the prince. "I see, my dear Christo, that my foster sisters give you a very proper portion of trouble. However, I must be off to my travelling companion. Come in as soon as you can, my dear fellow, and we will settle every thing. A good vintage to you, and only as much mischief as necessary." So saying, the prince tripped away.

"Well! who would have thought of seeing him here!" exclaimed the worthy primate. "The same gay dog as ever! What can he have been doing in Roumelia? Affairs of state, indeed! I'll wager my new epiphany scarf, that, whatever the affairs are, there is a pretty girl in the case."

XVI.

The fair Iduna, after all her perils and sufferings, was at length sheltered in safety under a kind and domestic roof. Alexina, and Helena, and Lais, and all the other sisters emulated each other in the attentions which they lavished upon the two brothers, but especially the youngest. Their kindness, indeed, was only equalled by their ceaseless curiosity, and had they ever waited for the answers of Iduna to their questions, the daughter of Hunniades might, perhaps, have been somewhat puzzled to reconcile her responses with probability. Helena answered the questions of Alexina: Lais anticipated even Helena. All that Iduna had to do, was to smile and be silent, and it was universally agreed that Iskander was singularly shy as well as excessively handsome. In the meantime, when Nicæus met Iduna in the evening of the second day of their visit, he informed her that he had been so fortunate as to resume an acquaintance with an old companion in arms in the person of a neighbouring noble, who had invited them to rest at his castle at the end of their next day's journey. He told her likewise that he had dispatched a courier to Croia to inquire after Iskander, who, he expected, in the course of a very few days, would bring them intelligence to guide their future movements, and decide whether they should at once proceed to the capital of Epirus, or advance into Bulgaria, in case Hunniades was still in the field. On the morrow, therefore, they proceeded on their journey. Nicæus had procured a litter for Iduna, for which her delicate health was an excuse to Alexina and her sisters, and they were attended by a small body of well-armed cavalry, for, according to the accounts which Nicæus had received, the country was still disturbed. They departed at break of day, Nicæus riding by the side of the litter, and occasionally making the most anxious inquiries after the well-being of his fair charge. An hour after noon they rested at a well, surrounded by olive trees, until the extreme heat was somewhat allayed; and then remounting, proceeded in the direction of an undulating ridge of green hills, that partially intersected the wide plain. Towards sunset the prince of Athens withdrew the curtains of the litter, and called the attention of Iduna to a very fair castle, rising on a fertile eminence and sparkling in the quivering beams of dying light.

"I fear," said Nicæus, "that my friend Justinian will scarcely have returned, but we are old comrades, and he desired me to act as his seneschal. For your sake I am sorry, Iduna, for I feel convinced that he would please you."

"It is, indeed, a fair castle," replied Iduna, "and none but a true knight deserves such a noble residence."

While she spoke the commander of the escort sounded his bugle, and they commenced the ascent of the steep, a winding road, cut through a thick wood of evergreen shrubs. The gradual and easy ascent soon brought them to a portal flanked with towers, which admitted them into the outworks of the fortification. Here they found several soldiers on guard, and the commander again sounding his bugle, the gates of the castle opened, and the seneschal, attended by a suite of many domestics, advanced and welcomed Nicæus and Iduna. The prince of Athens dismounting, assisted his fair companion from the litter, and leading her by the hand, and preceded by the seneschal, entered the castle.

They passed through a magnificent hall, hung with choice armour, and ascending a staircase, of Pentelic marble, were ushered into a suite of lofty chambers, lined with oriental tapestry, and furnished with many costly couches and cabinets. While they admired a spectacle so different to any thing they had recently beheld or experienced, the seneschal, followed by a number of slaves in splendid attire, advanced and offered them rare and choice refreshments, coffee and confectionary, sherbets and spiced wines. When they had partaken of this elegant cheer, Nicæus intimated to the seneschal that the lady Iduna might probably wish to retire, and instantly a discreet matron, followed by six most beautiful girls, each bearing a fragrant orch of cinnamon and roses, advanced and offered to conduct the lady Iduna to her apartments.

The matron and her company of maidens conducted the daughter of Hunniades down a long gallery, which led to a suite of the prettiest chambers in the world. The first was an ante-chamber, painted like a bower, but filled with the music of living birds; the second, which was much larger, was entirely covered with Venetian mirrors, and resting on a bright Persian carpet, were many couches of crimson velvet, covered with a variety of sumptuous dresses ; the third room was a bath, made in the semblance of a gigantic shell. Its roof was of transparent alabaster, glowing with shadowy light.

XVII.

A flourish of trumpets announced the return of the lady Iduna, and the prince of Athens, magnificently attired, came forward with a smile and led her, with a compliment on her resuming the dress of her sex, if not of her country, to the banquet. Iduna was not uninfluenced by that excitement which is insensibly produced by a sudden change of scene and circumstances, and especially by an unexpected transition from hardship, peril, and suffering, to luxury, security, and enjoyment. Their spirits were elevated and gay : she smiled upon Nicæus with a cheerful sympathy. They feasted, they listened to sweet music, they talked over their late adventures, and animated by their own enjoyment, they became more sanguine as to the fate of Iskander.

“In two or three days we shall know more,” said Nicæus. “In the meantime, rest is absolutely necessary to you. It is only now that you will begin to be sensible of the exertion you have made. If Iskander be at Croia, he has already informed your father of your escape ; if he have not arrived, I have arranged that a courier shall be dispatched to Hunniades from that city. Do not be anxious. Try to be happy. I am myself sanguine that you will find all well. Come, pledge me your father's health, fair lady, in this goblet of Tenedos !”

“How know I that at this moment he may not be at the point of death ?” replied Iduna. “When I am absent from those I love, I dream only of their unhappiness.”

“At this moment also,” rejoined Nicæus, “he dreams perhaps of your imprisonment among barbarians. Yet how mistaken ! Let that consideration support you. Come ! here is to the eremite.”

“As willing, if not as sumptuous a host as our present one,” said Iduna ; “and when, by-the-bye, do you think that your friend, the lord Justinian, will arrive.”

“Oh ! never mind him,” said Nicæus. “He would have arrived to-morrow, but the great news which I gave him has probably changed his plans. I told him of the approaching invasion, and he has perhaps found it necessary to visit the neighbouring chieftains, or even to go on to Croia.”

“Well-a-day !” exclaimed Iduna, “I would we were in my father's camp !”

“We shall soon be there, dear lady,” replied the prince. “Come, worthy seneschal,” he added, turning to that functionary, “drink to this noble lady's happy meeting with her friends.”

XVIII.

Three or four days passed away at the castle of Justinian, in which Nicæus used his utmost exertions to divert the anxiety of Iduna. One day was spent in examining the castle, on another he amused her with a hawking party, on a third he carried her to the neighbouring ruins of a temple, and read his favourite Æschylus to her amid its lone and elegant columns. It was impossible for any one to be more amiable and entertaining, and Iduna could not resist from recognizing his many virtues and accomplishments. The courier had not yet returned from Croia, which Nicæus accounted for by many satisfactory reasons. The suspense, however, at length became so painful to Iduna, that she proposed to the prince of Athens that they should, without further delay, proceed to that city. As usual, Nicæus was not wanting in many plausible arguments in favour of their remaining at the castle, but Iduna was resolute.

“Indeed, dear Nicæus,” she said, “my anxiety to see my father, or hear from him, is so great, that there is scarcely any danger which I would not encounter to gratify my wish. I feel that I have already taxed your endurance too much. But we are no longer in a hostile land, and guards and guides are to be engaged. Let me then depart alone!”

“Iduna!” exclaimed Nicæus, reproachfully. “Alas! Iduna, you are cruel, but I did not expect this!”

“Dear Nicæus!” she answered, “you always misinterpret me! It would infinitely delight me to be restored to Hunniades by yourself, but these are no common times, and you are no common person. You forget that there is one that has greater claims upon you even than a forlorn maiden—your country. And whether Iskander be at Croia or not, Greece requires the presence and exertions of the prince of Athens.”

“I have no country,” replied Nicæus, mournfully, “and no object for which to exert myself.”

“Licæus! Is this the poetic patriot who was yesterday envying Themistocles?”

“Alas! Iduna, yesterday you were my muse. I do not wonder you are wearied of this castle,” continued the prince in a melancholy tone. “This spot contains nothing to interest you; but for me, it holds all that is dear, and—oh! gentle maiden, one smile from you, one smile of inspiration, and I would not envy Themistocles, and might perhaps rival him.”

They were walking together in the hall of the castle; Iduna stepped aside and affected to examine a curious buckler. Nicæus followed her, and placing his arm gently in hers, led her away.

“Dearest Iduna,” he said, pardon me, but men struggle for their fate. Mine is in your power. It is a contest between misery and happiness, glory and perhaps infamy. Do not then wonder that I will not yield my chance of the brighter fortune without an effort. Once more I appeal to your pity, if not to your love. Were Iduna mine, were she to hold out but the possibility of her being mine, there is no career—solemnly I avow what solemnly I feel—there is no career of which I could not be capable, and no conditions to which I would not willingly subscribe. But this certainty, or this contingency, I must have: I cannot exist without the alternative. And now, upon my knees, I implore her to grant it to me!”

“Nicæus,” said Iduna, “this continued recurrence to a forbidden subject is most ungenerous.”

“Alas! Iduna, my life depends upon a word, which you will not speak, and you talk of generosity! No! Iduna, it is not I that am ungenerous.”

“Let me say then unreasonable, prince Nicæus.”

"Say what you like, Iduna, provided you say that you are mine."

"Pardon me, sir; I am free."

"Free! You have ever underrated me, Iduna. To whom do you owe this boasted freedom?"

"This is not the first time," remarked Iduna, "that you have reminded me of an obligation, the memory of which is indelibly impressed upon my heart, and for which even the present conversation cannot make me feel less grateful. I can never forget that I owe all that is dear to yourself and your companion."

"My companion!" replied the prince of Athens, pale and passionate. "My companion! Am I ever to be reminded of my companion?"

"Nicæus!" said Iduna; "if you forget what is due to me, at least endeavour to remember what is due to yourself!"

"Beautiful being!" said the prince, advancing and passionately seizing her hand; "pardon me!—pardon me! I am not master of my reason; I am nothing, I am nothing while Iduna hesitates."

"She does not hesitate, Nicæus. I desire—I require that this conversation shall cease—shall never, never be renewed."

"And I tell thee, haughty woman," said the prince of Athens grinding his teeth, and speaking with violent action, "that I will no longer be despised with impunity. Iduna is mine, or is no one else's."

"Is it possible?" exclaimed the daughter of Hunniades. "Is it indeed come to this? But why am I surprised! I have long known Nicæus. I quit this castle instantly."

"You are a prisoner," replied the prince very calmly, and leaning with folded arms against the wall.

“A prisoner!” exclaimed Iduna, a little alarmed—“A prisoner! I defy you, sir. You are only a guest like myself. I will appeal to the seneschal in the absence of his lord. He will never permit the honour of his master’s flag to be violated by the irrational caprice of a passionate boy.”

“What lord?” inquired Nicæus.

“Your friend, the lord Justinian,” answered Iduna. “He could little anticipate such an abuse of his hospitality.”

“My friend, the lord Justinian!” replied Nicæus with a malignant smile. “I am surprised that a personage of the lady Iduna’s deep discrimination should so easily be deceived by ‘a passionate boy!’ Is it possible that you could have supposed for a moment that there was any other lord of this castle, save your devoted slave?”

“What!” exclaimed Iduna, really frightened.

“I have indeed the honour of finding the lady Iduna my guest,” continued Nicæus in a tone of bitter raillery. “This castle of Kallista, the fairest in all Epirus, I inherit from my mother. Of late I have seldom visited it; but indeed it will become a favourite residence of mine, if it be, as I anticipate, the scene of my nuptial ceremony.”

Iduna looked around her with astonishment, then threw herself upon a couch, and burst into tears. The prince of Athens walked up and down the hall with an air of determined coolness.

“Perfidious!” exclaimed Iduna between her sobs.

“Lady Iduna,” said the prince, and he seated himself by her side. “I will not attempt to palliate a deception which your charms could alone inspire and can alone justify. Hear me, Lady Iduna, hear me with calmness. I love you; I love you with a passion which has been as constant as it is strong. My birth, my rank, my fortunes, do not disqualify me for an union with the daughter of the great Hunniades. If my personal claims may sink in comparison with her surpassing excellence, I am yet to learn that any other prince in Christendom can urge a more effective plea. I am young; the ladies of the court have called me handsome; by your great father's side I have broken some lances in your honour; and even Iduna once confessed she thought me clever. Come, come, be merciful! Let my beautiful Athens receive a fitting mistress! A holy father is in readiness, dear maiden. Come now, one smile! In a few days we shall reach your father's camp, and then we will kneel, as I do now, and beg a blessing on our happy union." As he spoke, he dropped upon his knee, and stealing her hand, looked into her face. It was sorrowful and gloomy.

"It is in vain, Nicæus," said Iduna, "to appeal to your generosity; it is useless to talk of the past; it is idle to reproach you for the present. I am a woman, alone and persecuted, where I could least anticipate persecution. Nicæus, I never can be your's; and now I deliver myself to the mercy of Almighty God."

"'Tis well," said Nicæus. "From the tower of the castle you may behold the waves of the Ionian sea. You will remain here a close prisoner, until one of my galleys arrive from Piræus to bear us to Italy. Mine you must be, Iduna. It remains for you to decide under what circumstances. Continue in your obstinacy, and you may bid farewell for ever to your country and to your father. Be reasonable, and a destiny awaits you, which offers everything that has hitherto been considered the source or cause of happiness." Thus speaking, the prince retired, leaving the lady Iduna to her own unhappy thoughts.

XIX.

The lady Iduna was at first inclined to view the conduct of the prince of Athens as one of those passionate and passing ebullitions in which her long acquaintance with him had taught her he was accustomed to indulge. But when on retiring soon after to her apartments, she was informed by her attendant matron that she must in future consider herself a prisoner, and not venture again to quit them without permission, she began to tremble at the possible violence of an ill-regulated mind. She endeavoured to interest her attendant in her behalf; but the matron was too well schooled to evince any feeling or express any opinion on the subject; and indeed, at length, fairly informed Iduna that she was commanded to confine her conversation to the duties of her office.

The lady Iduna was very unhappy. She thought of her father, she thought of Iskander. The past seemed a dream; she was often tempted to believe that she was still, and had ever been, a prisoner in the serail of Adrianople; and that all the late wonderful incidents of her life were but the shifting scenes of some wild slumber. And then some slight incident, the sound of a bell, or the sight of some holy emblem, assured her she was in a Christian land, and convinced her of the strange truth that she was indeed in captivity, and a prisoner, above all others, to the fond companion of her youth. Her indignation at the conduct of Nicaeus roused her courage; she resolved to make an effort to escape. Her rooms were only lighted from above; she determined to steal forth at night into the gallery; the door was secured. She hastened back to her chamber in fear and sorrow, and wept.

Twice in the course of the day the stern and silent matron visited Iduna with her food; and as she retired, secured the door. This was the only individual that the imprisoned lady ever beheld. And thus heavily rolled on upwards of a week. On the eve of the ninth day, Iduna was surprised by the matron presenting her a letter as she quitted the chamber for the night. Iduna seized it with a feeling of curiosity not unmixed with pleasure. It was the only incident that had occurred during her captivity. She recognized the hand-writing of Nicæus, and threw it down with vexation at her silliness in supposing, for a moment, that the matron could have been the emissary of any other person.

Yet the letter must be read, and at length she opened it. It informed her that a ship had arrived from Athens at the coast, and that to-morrow she must depart for Italy. It told her also, that the Turks, under Mahomed, had invaded Albania; and that the Hungarians under the command of her father, had come to support the cross. It said nothing of Iskander. But it reminded her that little more than the same time that would carry her to the coast to embark for a foreign land, would, were she wise, alike enable Nicæus to place her in her father's arms, and allow him to join in the great struggle for his country and his creed. The letter was written with firmness, but tenderly. It left, however, on the mind of Iduna an impression of the desperate resolution of the writer.

Now it so happened that as this unhappy lady jumped from her couch, and paced the room in the perturbation of her mind, the wind of her drapery extinguished her lamp. As her attendant, or gaoler, had paid her last visit for the day, there seemed little chance of its being again illumined. The miserable are always more unhappy in the dark. Light is the greatest of comforters. And this little misfortune seemed to the forlorn Iduna almost overwhelming. And as she attempted to look around, and wrung her hands in very wo, her attention was attracted by a brilliant streak of light upon the wall, which greatly surprised her. She groped her way in its direction, and slowly stretching forth her hand, observed that it made its way through a chink in the frame of one of the great mirrors which were inlaid in the wall. And as she pressed the frame, she felt to her surprise that it sprang forward. Had she not been very cautious the advancing mirror would have struck her with great force, but she had presence of mind to withdraw her hand very gradually, repressing the swiftness of the spring. The aperture occasioned by the opening of the mirror consisted of a recess, formed by a closed up window. An old wooden shutter, or blind, in so ruinous a state, that the light freely made its way, was the only barrier against the elements. Iduna, seizing the handle which remained, at once drew it open with little difficulty.

The captive gazed with gladdened feelings upon the free and beautiful scene. Beneath her rose the rich and aromatic shrubs tinged with the soft and silver light of eve: before her extended the wide and fertile champaign, skirted by the dark and undulating mountains: in the clear sky, glittering and sharp, sparkled the first crescent of the new moon, an auspicious omen to the Moslemin invaders.

Iduna gazed with joy upon the landscape, and then hastily descending from the recess, she placed her hands to her eyes, so long unaccustomed to the light. Perhaps, too, she indulged in momentary meditation. For suddenly seizing a number of shawls which were lying on one of the couches, she knotted them together, and then striving with all her force, she placed the heaviest couch on one end of the costly cord, and then throwing the other out of the window, and entrusting herself to the merciful care of the holy Virgin, the brave daughter of Hunniades successfully dropped down into the garden below.

She stopped to breathe, and to revel in her emancipated existence. It was a bold enterprize gallantly achieved. But the danger had now only commenced. She found that she had lighted at the back of the castle. She stole along upon tip-toe, timid as a fawn. She remembered a small wicket-gate that led into the open country. She arrived at it. It was of course guarded. The single sentinel was kneeling before an image of St George, beside him was an empty drinking-cup and an exhausted wine-skin.

“Holy saint!” exclaimed the pious sentinel, “preserve us from all Turkish infidels!” Iduna stole behind him. “Shall men who drink no wine conquer true Christians!” continued the sentinel. Iduna placed her hand upon the lock. “We thank thee for our good vintage, said the sentinel. Iduna opened the gate with the noiseless touch which a feminine finger can alone command. “And for the rise of the lord Iskander!” added the sentinel. Iduna escaped!

Now she indeed was free. Swiftly she ran over the wide plain. She hoped to reach some town or village before her escape could be discovered, and she hurried on for three hours without resting. She came to a beautiful grove of olive-trees that spread in extensive ramifications about the plain. And through this beautiful grove of olive-trees her path seemed to lead. So she entered and advanced. And when she had journeyed for about a mile, she came to an open and very verdant piece of ground, which was, as it were, the heart of the grove. In its centre rose a fair and antique structure of white marble, shrouding from the noonday sun the perennial flow of a very famous fountain. It was near on midnight. Iduna was wearied, and she sat down upon the steps of the fountain for rest. And while she was musing over all the strange adventures of her life, she heard a rustling in the wood, and being alarmed, she rose and hid herself behind a tree.

And while she stood there, with palpitating heart, the figure of a man advanced to the fountain from an opposite direction of the grove. He went up the steps, and looked down upon the spring as if he were about to drink, but instead of doing that, he drew his scimeter and plunged it into the water, and called out with a loud voice the name of "Iskander!" three times. Whereupon Iduna, actuated by an irresistible impulse, came forward from her hiding place, but instantly gave a loud shriek when she beheld—the prince Mahomed!

"Oh! night of glory!" exclaimed the prince, advancing. "Do I indeed behold the fair Iduna! This is truly magic!"

"Away! away!" exclaimed the distracted Iduna, as she endeavoured to fly from him.

"He has kept his word, that cunning leech, better than I expected," said Mahomed, seizing her.

"As well as you deserve, ravisher!" exclaimed a majestic voice. A tall figure rushed forward from the wood and dashed back the Turk.

"I am here to complete my contract, prince Mahomed," said the stranger, drawing his sword.

"Iskander!" exclaimed the prince.

"We have met before, prince. Let us so act now that we may meet for the last time."

"Infamous, infernal traitor," exclaimed Mahomed, "dost thou, indeed, imagine that I will sully my imperial blade with the blood of my runaway slave! No! I came here to secure thy punishment, but I cannot condescend to become thy punisher. Advance, guards, and seize him! Seize them both!"

Iduna flew to Iskander, who caught her in one arm, while he waved his scimeter with the other. The guards of Mahomed poured forth from the side of the grove whence the prince had issued.

"And dost thou, indeed, think, Mahomed," said Iskander, "that I have been educated in the seraglio to be duped by Moslemin craft. I offer thee single combat if thou desirest it, but combat as we may, the struggle shall be equal." He whistled, and instantly a body of Hungarians, headed by Hunniades himself, advanced from the side of the grove whence Iskander had issued.

"Come on, then," said Mahomed; "each to his man." Their swords clashed, but the principal attendants of the son of Amurath, deeming the affair, under the present circumstances, assumed the character of a mere rash adventure, bore away the Turkish prince.

"To-morrow, then, this fray shall be decided, on the plains of Kallista," said Mahomed.

"Epirus is prepared," replied Iskander.

The Turks withdrew. Iskander bore the senseless form of Iduna to her father. Hunniades embraced his long lost child. They sprinkled her face with water from the fountain. She revived.

"Where is Nicæus," inquired Iskander; and how came you again, dear lady, in the power of Mahomed?"

“Alas ! noble sir, my twice deliverer,” answered Iduna, “I have, indeed, again been doomed to captivity, but my persecutor, I blush to say, was this time a Christian prince.”

“Holy Virgin !” exclaimed Iskander. Who can this villain be ?”

“The villain, lord Iskander, is your friend ; and your pupil, dear father.”

“Nicæus, of Athens !” exclaimed Hunniades. Iskander was silent and melancholy.

Thereupon the lady Iduna recounted to her father and Iskander, sitting between them on the margin of the fount, all that had occurred to her, since herself and Nicæus parted with Iskander ; nor did she omit to relate to Hunniades all the devotion of Iskander, respecting which, like a truly brave man, he had himself been silent. The great Hunniades scarcely knew which rather to do, to lavish his affection on his beloved child, or his gratitude upon Iskander. Thus they went on conversing for some time, Iskander placing his own cloak around Iduna, and almost unconsciously winding his arm around her unresisting form.

Just as they were preparing to return to the Christian camp, a great noise was heard in the grove, and presently, in the direction whence Iduna had arrived, there came a band of men, bearing torches and examining the grove in all directions in great agitation. Iskander and Hunniades stood upon their guard, but soon perceived they were Greeks. Their leader, seeing a group near the fountain, advanced to make inquiries respecting the object of his search, but when he indeed recognized the persons who formed the group, the torch fell from his grasp, and he turned away his head and hid his face in his hands.

Iduna clung to her father ; Iskander stood with his eyes fixed upon the ground, but Hunniades, stern and terrible, disembarassing himself of the grasp of his daughter, advanced and laid his hand upon the stranger.

“Young man,” said the noble father, “were it contrition instead of shame that inspired this attitude, it might be better. I have often warned you of the fatal consequences of a reckless indulgence of the passions. More than once I have predicted to you, that however great might be your confidence in your ingenuity and your resources, the hour would arrive when such a career would place you in a position as despicable as it was shameful. That hour has arrived, and that position is now filled by the prince of Athens. You stand before the three individuals in this world whom you have most injured, and whom you were most bound to love and to protect. Here is a friend, who has hazarded his prosperity and his existence for your life and your happiness. And you have made him a mere pander to your lusts, and then deserted him in his greatest necessities. This maiden was the companion of your youth, and entitled to your kindest offices. You have treated her infinitely worse than her Turkish captor. And for myself, sir, your father was my dearest friend. I endeavoured to repay his friendship by supplying his place to his orphan child. How I discharged my duty, it becomes not me to say : how you have discharged your’s, this lady here, my daughter, your late prisoner, sir, can best prove.”

“Oh ! spare me, spare me, sir,” said the prince of Athens, turning and falling upon his knee.—“I am most wretched. Every word cuts to my very core. Just Providence has baffled all my arts, and I am grateful. Whether this lady can, indeed, forgive me, I hardly dare to think, or even hope.

And yet forgiveness is a heavenly boon. Perhaps the memory of old days may melt her. As for yourself, sir—but I'll not speak, I cannot. Noble Iskander, if I mistake not, you may whisper words in that fair ear, less grating than my own. May you be happy ! I will not profane your prospects with my vows. And yet I'll say farewell !”

The prince of Athens turned away with an air of complete wretchedness, and slowly withdrew. Iskander followed him.

“Nicæus,” said Iskander ; but the prince entered the grove, and did not turn round.

“Dear Nicæus,” said Iskander. The prince hesitated.

“Let us not part thus,” said Iskander. “Iduna is most unhappy. She bade me tell you she had forgotten all.”

“God bless her, and God bless you too !” replied Nicæus. “I pray you let me go.”

“Nay ! dear Nicæus, are we not friends ?”

“The best and truest, Iskander. I will to the camp, and meet you in your tent ere morning break. At present, I would be alone.”

“Dear Nicæus, one word. You have said upon one point, what I could well wish unsaid, and dared to prophesy what may never happen. I am not made for such supreme felicity. Epirus is my mistress, my Nicæus. As there is a living God, my friend, most solemnly I vow, I have had no thoughts in this affair, but for your honour.”

“I know it, my dear friend, I know it,” replied Nicæus. “I keenly feel your admirable worth. Say no more, say no more ! She is a fit wife for a hero, and you are one !”

XX.

After the battle of the bridge, Iskander had hurried to Croia without delay. In his progress, he had made many fruitless inquiries after Iduna and Nicæus, but he consoled himself for the unsatisfactory answers he received by the opinion that they had taken a different course, and the conviction that all must now be safe. The messenger from Croia that informed Hunniades of the escape of his daughter, also solicited his aid in favour of Epirus against the impending invasion of the Turks, and stimulated by personal gratitude as well as by public duty, Hunniades answered the solicitation in person, at the head of twenty thousand lances.

Hunniades and Iskander had mutually flattered themselves when apart, that each would be able to quell the anxiety of the other on the subject of Iduna. The leader of Epirus flattered himself that his late companions had proceeded at once to Transylvania, and the vaivode himself had indulged in the delightful hope that the first person he should embrace at Croia would be his long-lost child. When, therefore, they met, and were mutually incapable of imparting any information on the subject to each other, they were filled with astonishment and disquietude. Events, however, gave them little opportunity to indulge in anxiety or grief. On the day that Hunniades and his lances arrived at Croia, the invading army of the Turks under the prince Mahomed crossed the mountains, and soon after pitched their camp on the fertile plain of Kallista.

As Iskander, by the aid of Hunniades and the neighbouring princes, and the patriotic exertions of his countrymen, was at this moment at the head of a force which the Turkish prince could not have anticipated, he resolved to march at once to meet the Ottomans, and decide the fate of Greece by a pitched battle.

The night before the arrival of Iduna at the famous fountain, the Christian army had taken up its position within a few miles of the Turks. The turbaned warriors wished to delay the engagement until the new moon, the eve of which was at hand. And it happened on that said eve that Iskander, calling to mind his contract with the Turkish prince made in the gardens of the seraglio at Adrianople, and believing from the superstitious character of Mahomed that he would not fail to be at the appointed spot, resolved, as we have seen, to repair to the fountain of Kallista.

And now from that fountain the hero retired, bearing with him a prize scarcely less precious than the freedom of the country, for which he was to combat on the morrow's morn.

Ere the dawn had broken, the Christian power was in motion. Iskander commanded the centre, Hunniades the right wing. The left was entrusted at his urgent request to the prince of Athens. A mist that hung about the plain allowed Nicæus to charge the right wing of the Turks almost unperceived. He charged with irresistible fury, and soon disordered the ranks of the Moslemin. Mahomed with the reserve hastened to their aid. A mighty multitude of Janissaries, shouting the name of Allah and his prophet, penetrated the Christian centre. Hunniades endeavoured to attack them on their flank, but was himself charged by the Turkish cavalry. The battle was now general, and raged with terrible fury. Iskander had secreted in his centre, a new and powerful battery of cannon, presented to him by the pope, and which had just arrived from Venice. This battery played upon the Janissaries with great destruction. He himself mowed them down with his irresistible scimeter.

Infinite was the slaughter! awful the uproar! But of all the Christian knights, this day, no one performed such mighty feats of arms as the prince of Athens. With a reckless desperation, he dashed about the field, and every thing seemed to yield to his inspired impulse. His example animated his men with such a degree of enthusiasm, that the division to which he was opposed, although encouraged by the presence of Mahomed himself, could no longer withstand the desperate courage of the Christians, and they fled in all directions. Then, rushing to the aid of Iskander, Nicæus, at the head of a body of picked men, dashed upon the rear of the Janissaries, and nearly surrounded them. Hunniades instantly made a fresh charge upon the left wing of the Turks. A panic fell upon the Moslem-in, who were little prepared for such a demonstration of strength on the part of their adversaries. In a few minutes their order seemed generally broken, and their leaders in vain endeavoured to rally them. Waving his bloody scimeter, and bounding on his black charger, Iskander called upon his men to secure the triumph of the cross and the freedom of Epirus. Pursuit was now general.

XXI.

The Turks were massacred by thousands. Mahomed, when he found that all was lost, fled to the mountains, with a train of guards and eunuchs, and left the care of his dispersed host to his pachas.—The hills were covered with the fugitives and their pursuers. Some fled also to the sea-shore, where the Turkish fleet was at anchor. The plain was strewn with corpses and arms, and tents and standards. The sun was now high in the heavens. The mist had cleared away ; but occasional clouds of smoke still sailed about.

A solitary Christian knight entered a winding pass in the green hills, apart from the scene of strife. The slow and trembling step of his wearied steed would have ill qualified him to join in the triumphant pursuit, even had he himself been physically enabled ; but the Christian knight was covered with gore, unhappily not alone that of his enemies. He was, indeed, streaming with desperate wounds, and scarcely could his fainting form retain its tottering seat.

The winding pass, which, for some singular reason, he now pursued in solitude, instead of returning to the busy camp for aid and assistance, conducted the knight to a small green valley, covered with sweet herbs, and entirely surrounded by hanging woods. In the centre, rose the ruins of a Doric fane : three or four columns grey and majestic. All was still and silent, save that in the clear blue sky an eagle flew, high in the air, but whirling round the temple.

The knight reached the ruins of the Doric fane, and with difficulty dismounting from his charger, fell upon the soft and flowery turf, and for some moments was motionless. His horse stole a few yards away, and though scarcely less injured than its rider, instantly commenced cropping the inviting pasture.

At length the Christian knight slowly raised his head, and leaning on his arm, sighed deeply. His face was very pale ; but as he looked up and perceived the eagle in the heaven, a smile played upon his pallid cheek, and his beautiful eye gleamed with a sudden flash of light.

“Glorious bird !” murmured the Christian warrior, “once I deemed that my career might resemble thine ! ’Tis over now ; and Greece, for which I would have done so much, will soon forget my immemorial name. I have stolen here to die in silence and in beauty. This blue air, and these green woods, and these lone columns, which oft to me have been a consolation, breathing of the poetic past, and of the days wherein I fain had lived, I have escaped from the fell field of carnage to die among them. Farewell ! my country ! Farewell to one more beautiful than Greece—farewell, Iduna !”

These were the last words of Nicæus, prince of Athens !

XXII.

While the unhappy lover of the daughter of Hunniades breathed his last words to the solitary elements, his more fortunate friend received, in the centre of his scene of triumph, the glorious congratulations of his emancipated country. The discomfiture of the Turks was complete, and this overthrow, coupled with their recent defeat in Bulgaria, secured Christendom from their assaults during the remainder of the reign of Amurath the second. Surrounded by his princely allies, and the chieftains of Epirus, the victorious standards of Christendom, and the triumphant trophies of the Moslemin, Iskander received from the great Hunniades the hand of his beautiful daughter.—

“Thanks to these brave warriors,” said the hero,
“I can now offer to your daughter a safe, an honourable, and a Christian home.”

“It is to thee, great sir, that Epirus owes its security,” said an ancient chieftain, addressing Iskander, “its national existence, and its holy religion. All that we have to do now is to preserve them; nor indeed do I see that we can more effectually obtain these great objects than by entreating thee to mount the redeemed throne of thy ancestors. Therefore I say GOD SAVE ISKANDER, KING OF EPIRUS!”

And all the people shouted and said, “GOD SAVE THE KING! GOD SAVE ISKANDER, KING OF EPIRUS!”

THE END.

11

12

13

14

15

16

17

18

19

20

21

22

23

24

25

JUST PUBLISHED BY CAREY, LEA, & BLANCHARD.

CHARACTERISTICS OF WOMEN. By Mrs. JAMIESON,
Author of the Diary of an Ennuyée. In 2 vols.

"Nothing can be finer than the tact with which Mrs. Jamieson enters into the infinite varieties of feminine character,—nothing more delicate than the discrimination with which she marks the boundaries of feeling; and there is a lofty purity, a generous warmth, which pervades the whole work, and gives a singular truthlike life to its delineations."—Lit. Gazette.

"Few books have ever come under our notice better deserving the strongest recommendation it is in our power to bestow, than the work of Mrs. Jamieson. Her talents are not only of the highest, but also of the rarest order—of such order, indeed, as it is the lot of few women to possess. Her work, taken altogether, is one of the most delightful of modern times."—New Monthly Mag.

LEGENDS OF THE LIBRARY AT LILIES. By the Lord and Lady there. In 2 vols. 12mo.

"Two delightful volumes, various, graceful, with the pathos exquisitely relieved by gaiety; and the romantic legend well contrasted by the lively sketch from actual existence."—Literary Gazette.

NEW GIL BLAS, or PEDRO OF PENAFLOR. By R. D. INGLIS, Author of Spain in 1830, &c. In the press.

"The whole work is very amusing."—Lit. Gaz.

"Those who want a few hours' pleasant reading are not likely to meet with a book more to their taste."—Athenæum.

THE BUCCANEER. By Mrs. S. C. HALL. In 2 vols. In the press.

"The perusal of these volumes warrants our preconceived impressions of the ample capacities of Mrs. Hall to sustain the bolder flight she has undertaken."—United Service Journal.

"The work now before us belongs to the historical school; but it has that talent which bestows its own attraction on whatever subject its peculiar taste may select. We sincerely congratulate Mrs. Hall on the interest and the talent displayed in the Buccaneer."—Lit. Gazette.

SWALLOW BARN, or, A SOJOURN IN THE OLD DOMINION. In 2 vols. 12mo.

"We cannot but predict a warm reception of this work among all persons who have not lost their relish for nature and probability, as well as all those who can properly estimate the beauties of simplicity in thought and expression."—New York Mirror.

"One of the cleverest of the last publications written on this or the other side of the Atlantic."—New York Courier and Inquirer.

"The style is admirable, and the sketches of character, men, and scenery, so fresh and agreeable, that we cannot help feeling that they are drawn from nature."

IVAN VEJEEGHEN, or LIFE IN RUSSIA. By Thaddeus
Bulgarin. 2 vols. 12mo.

"This is a genuine Russian novel, and a tale, which, with the interest of a fictitious story, presents many details of a state of society of which nothing can be learned from books of travels. It is in every respect equal to Hope's Anastasius, and well deserves to equal that renowned romance in popularity; it has all the novelty and the ability."—Monthly Magazine.

THE ALHAMBRA; a series of Tales and Sketches of the Moors and Spaniards. By the Author of the Sketch-Book, &c.
2 vols. 12mo.

"Mr. Irving has fairly trusted himself 'to the golden shores of old romance,' and yielded to all their influences. He has carried us into a world of marble fountains, moonlight, arabesques, and perfumes. We do not know whether reform and retrenchment have left any imagination in the world, but this we know, that if there be any fantasies yet slumbering deep within the souls, the tales of the Alhambra must awaken them."—London Literary Gazette.

LIBRARY OF ROMANCE.

THE GHOST HUNTER AND HIS FAMILY, by the O'Hara Family; being the first volume of the Library of Romance, edited by Leitch Ritchie, author of "The Romance of French History," "Heath's Picturesque Annual," &c., and Thomas Roscoe, author of "The Landscape Annual," editor of "The English, Italian, German, and Spanish Novelists," &c. To be continued in monthly volumes.

"We are saying much when we say the "Ghost Hunter" sustains the high reputation the author, Mr. Banim, has acquired. The story is admirably calculated for developing strong and powerful traits of character, and its personages have about them nothing of indistinctness, of confusion, of obscurity, but are displayed in vivid relief, touched into and breathing of actual life."—Knickerbocker.

"The Tale is one of true pathos, containing some very fine scenes, and several admirably sustained characters."—Balt. American.

"Mr. Banim, under the plural sobriquet of the 'O'Hara Family,' has become one of the most popular of modern novel writers. His style, his conceptions, and his descriptions, are peculiarly his own; and his attempts to delineate the wild humor, and impetuous passion of Irish life, arduous and almost un essayed as was the task, has been attended with the most signal and flattering success."—The Knickerbocker.

"A capital selection for a pioneer volume. It is the production of the celebrated "O'Hara Family," and furnishes a fine picture of Irish life and manners, disclosing, in a happy manner, much of the genuine nature, and many of the peculiarities, of that peculiar people. What will add exceedingly to the impression made upon the reader, is the fact, that the plot is based upon actual occurrences, and the characters, the most conspicuous of them, certainly, drawn from real life."—Traveller.

"A tale of more interest, or one in which the manners and superstitions of the Irish are more faithfully portrayed, has seldom, if ever, fallen under our observation."—Weekly Times.

Volume second, SCHINDERHANNES, THE ROBBER OF THE RHINE, by LEITCH RITCHIE.

"It is long since we have met with so bold, spirited, and original a story; the narrative carries us along like a horse at full gallop, divided between a pleasant feeling of terror and excitement; while the darker colors of the painting are relieved by exquisite touches of feminine truth and affection."—Lit. Gazette.

Volume third, WALTHAM, a Novel.

Volume fourth, TALES OF THE CARAVANSERAI, by J. B. FRASER, Author of the "Kuzzilbash."

Volume fifth, BUG JARGAL, a story of the Servile Wars of Saint Domingo, by VICTOR HUGO.

A succession of the most popular names in romantic literature will immediately follow.

MISCELLANEOUS.

LONDON NIGHTS' ENTERTAINMENTS, by LEITCH RITCHIE. In the press.

This work is supposed by eminent critics to be the chef d'œuvre of the author. "Mr. Ritchie is by far our best writer of romantic and imaginative tales," was the dictum of the Literary Gazette—and the Atlas pronounces him "the Scott of the short, picturesque, and bold story."

"The power of fascinating the reader, of chaining him down, as it were, while his fancy is tormented by terrible imaginings, is the principal characteristic of Mr. Leitch Ritchie's pictures."—London Weekly Review.

THE PRINCIPLES OF CHRISTIAN PHILOSOPHY; containing the Doctrines, Duties, Admonitions, and Consolations of the Christian Religion, by JOHN BURNS, M. D., F. R. S. From the 4th London edition. In the press.

THE LADY'S MEDICAL GUIDE, being a popular treatise on the 'causes, prevention, and mode of treatment of the diseases to which females are particularly subject. By RICHARD REECE, M. D. A small pocket volume.

PENCIL SKETCHES; OR OUTLINES OF INCIDENT AND CHARACTER, by Miss LESLIE. In the press.

Contents.—The Escorted Lady—A Pic-nic at the Sea Shore—The Miss Vanlears—Sociable Visiting—Country Lodgings—Frank Finlay—The Travelling Tin-man—Uncle Philip—Mrs. Washington Potts.

ROSINE LAVAL, a Novel. In the press.

DELORAINÉ, a Novel, by W. GODWIN, Author of Caleb Williams, St. Leon, &c. In 2 vols. In the press.

EBEN ERSKINE; OR, THE TRAVELLER; a Novel, in 2 vols., by JOHN GALT, Esq., Author of Annals of the Parish, &c.

JOURNAL OF CONVERSATIONS WITH LORD BYRON, by the COUNTESS OF BLESSINGTON. In the press.

THE LAST MAN; by Mrs. SHELLEY, Author of Frankenstein. In 2 vols. In the press.

LIGHTS AND SHADOWS OF GERMAN LIFE. In 2 vols. In the press.

"The pictures here given of German life have an interest which to us is perfectly irresistible."—Sunday Times.

"The work under our notice has great claims to the consideration of every reader who likes good tales, in which he will find every thing in keeping."—Metropolitan.

TALES AND CONVERSATIONS; OR THE NEW CHILDREN'S FRIEND, by Mrs. MARKHAM. In 2 vols. 18mo. In the press.

"We conscientiously recommend Mrs. Markham to our Juvenile Readers."—Lit. Gazette.

"These volumes contain excellent instruction in a very agreeable form."—Spectator.

THE LIFE OF A SAILOR. By Captain FREDERICK CHAMIER, R. N. In 2 vols. 12mo. In the press.

"Most various and amusing volumes, embodying the real Adventures of a Captain in the Navy."—Lit. Gazette.

"Captain Chamier has had a full share of adventure, and undoubtedly possesses a facility of style and a playful manner. If ever there was a story to excite sympathy, to interest the feelings, and awaken the imagination of the reading world, it is the story of sharks, in this autobiography."—Spectator.

MISCELLANEOUS.

MILITARY MEMOIRS OF THE DUKE OF WELLINGTON By CAPT. MOYLE SHERER, Author of Recollections of Peninsula. In 2 vols. 18mo.

"The tone of feeling and reflection which pervades the work is in the characteristic mood of the writer, considerate, ardent, and chivalrous; his principles as might be expected, are sound and independent, and his language is frequent in those beauties which distinguish his previous writings. To us it is a work which will not discredit its illustrious subject."—United Service Journal

THE COMPLETE POETICAL WORKS OF JOANNE BAILLIE. 1 vol. 8vo.

This edition corresponds with the Library Editions of Byron, Scott, Mearns.
"Miss Baillie's Plays on the Passions have been long known as among the best in the language. No one who reads them can entertain a doubt of the actor of the writer's affections. Such works could never have been dictated by a cold heart."—Christian Examiner.

"We are among the most earnest admirers of her genius, her literary talents and skill, her diction, her success, her moral designs, and her poetical worth. Some of her tragedies have deservedly passed into the stock of the principal British and American theatres. They are express developments and delineations of the passions, marked by a deep insight into human nature, dramatic power of treatment, a fertile spirit of poetry, and the loftiest purest moral sentiment."—National Gazette.

TREATISE ON CLOCK AND WATCHMAKING, Theoretical and Practical. By THOMAS REID, Edinburgh Honorary Member of the Worshipful Company of Clock-Makers, London. Royal 8vo. Illustrated by numerous Plates.

GEOLOGICAL MANUAL. By H. T. DE LA BECHE. Illustrated with numerous wood-cuts.

"A work of first-rate importance in the science to which it relates, and must henceforth take its place in the library of every student in Geology."
Phil. Magazine.

"Mr. De la Beche's Geological Manual is the first and best work of the kind, and he has performed his task with a perfect knowledge of all that has been ascertained in Geology, and with considerable judgment and taste in the manner of doing it. So much geological science was never before compressed into so small a space."—Spectator.

HISTORY OF ENGLAND, by SIR JAMES MACKINTOSH. 10th edition. In the press.

. The first volume of this edition will contain the same matter as the first three volumes of the 18mo. edition.

A COLLECTION OF COLLOQUIAL PHRASES, on subjects necessary to maintain Conversation, the whole arranged as considerably to facilitate the acquisition of the language. By an Italian Gentleman. 1 vol. 18mo.

NOVELLE ITALIANE.—Stories from Italian Writers, with literal, interlinear translation on Locke's plan of Instruction, illustrated with Notes. First American edition, last London edition, with additional translations and notes

MISCELLANEOUS.

THE ALHAMBRA; a Series of Tales and Sketches of the Moors and Spaniards. By the author of the Sketch-Book. In 2 vols.

"We have read a part of Washington Irving's new Sketch Book, the scene of which is Spain, the most romantic of European countries, and the best known by the gifted author. His style has lost nothing of its peculiar charm,—his descriptions are as graphic as usual, and enlivened with racy anecdotes and happy reflection. We shall probably soon furnish a specimen of this work, from the whole of which we expect gratification."—Nat. Gazette.

THE BRAVO. By the author of the "Spy," "Pilot," "Red Rover," &c. In 2 vols. 12mo.

"Let us honestly avow in conclusion, that in addition to the charm of an interesting fiction to be found in these pages, there is more mental power in them, more matter that sets people thinking, more of that quality that is accelerating the onward movement of the world, than in all the Scotch novels that have so deservedly won our admiration."—New Monthly Mag.

"This new novel from the pen of our countryman, Cooper, will win new laurels for him. It is full of dramatic interest—"hair-breadth escapes"—animated and bustling scenes on the canals, in the prisons, on the Rialto, in the Adriatic, and in the streets of Venice."—N. Y. Courier & Enquirer.

"Of the whole work, we may confidently say that it is very able—a performance of genius and power."—Nat. Gazette.

"The Bravo will, we think, tend much to exalt and extend the fame of its author. We have hurried through its pages with an avidity which must find its apology in the interesting character of the incidents and the very vivid and graphic style in which they are described."

By the same author.

THE HEIDENMAUER, or PAGAN CAMP. In 2 vols.

SALMONIA; or, Days of Fly Fishing; by SIR H. DAVY.

"We are surprised, in meeting with an American reprint of this delightful volume, that a work so universally popular has not been before republished in this country."—N. Y. American.

"One of the most delightful labors of leisure ever seen; not a few of the most beautiful phenomena of nature are here lucidly explained."—Gent. Mag.

THE NATURAL HISTORY OF SELBORNE. By the late Rev. GILBERT WHITE, A. M., Fellow of the Oriel College, Oxford, with additions, by Sir William Jardine, Bart. F. R. S. E. F. L. S. M. W. S., author of "Illustrations of Ornithology."

"White's History of Selborne, the most fascinating piece of rural writing and sound English philosophy that has ever issued from the press."—Athenaeum.

THE MECHANISM OF THE HEAVENS, by Mrs. SOMERVILLE. In 18mo.

"We possess already innumerable discourses on Astronomy, in which the wonders of the heavens and their laws are treated of; but we can say most conscientiously that we are acquainted with none—not even La Place's own beautiful exposé in his System du Monde,—in which all that is essentially interesting in the motions and laws of the celestial bodies, or which is capable of popular enunciation, is so admirably, so graphically, or we may add, so unaffectedly and simply placed before us. * * * Is it asking too much of Mrs. Somerville to express a hope that she will allow this beautiful preliminary Dissertation to be printed separately, for the delight and instruction of thousands of readers, young and old, who cannot understand, or are too indolent to apply themselves to the more elaborate parts of the work? If she will do this, we hereby promise to exert our best endeavors to make its merits known."—Literary Gazette.

MISCELLANEOUS.

A MEMOIR OF SEBASTIAN CABOT, with a Review of the History of Maritime Discovery. Illustrated by Documents from the Rolls, now first published.

"Put forth in the most unpretending manner, and without a name, this work is of paramount importance to the subjects of which it treats."—Lit. Gazette. "The author has corrected many grave errors, and in general given us a clearer insight into transactions of considerable national interest."—Jb. "Will it not," says the author, with just astonishment, "be deemed almost incredible, that the very instrument in the Records of England, which recites the Great Discovery, and plainly contemplates a scheme of Colonization, should, up to this moment, have been treated by her own writers as that which first gave permission to go forth and explore?"—Jb. "We must return to investigate several collateral matters which we think deserving of more space than we can this week bestow. Meanwhile we recommend the work as one of great value and interest."—Jb.

"The general reader, as well as the navigator and the curious, will derive pleasure and information from this well-written production."—Courier.

"A specimen of honest inquiry. It is quite frightful to think of the number of the inaccuracies it exposes: we shall cease to have confidence in books." "The investigation of truth is not the fashion of these times. But every sincere inquirer after historical accuracy ought to purchase the book as a curiosity: more false assertions and inaccurate statements were never exposed in the same compass. It has given us a lesson we shall never forget, and hope to profit by."—Spect.

HISTORY OF THE NORTHMEN, OR NORMANS AND DANES; from the earliest times to the Conquest of England by William of Normandy. By Henry Wheaton, Member of the Scandinavian and Icelandic Literary Societies of Copenhagen.

This work embraces the great leading features of Scandinavian history, commencing with the heroic age, and advancing from the earliest dawn of civilization to the introduction of Christianity into the North—its long and bloody strife with Paganism—the discovery and colonization of Iceland, Greenland, and North America, by the Norwegian navigators, before the time of Columbus—the military and maritime expeditions of the Northmen—their early intercourse of commerce and war with Constantinople and the Eastern empire—the establishment of a Norman state in France, under Rollo, and the subjugation of England, first by the Danes, under Canute the Great, and subsequently by the Normans, under Duke William, the founder of the English monarchy. It also contains an account of the mythology and literature of the ancient North—the Icelandic language prevailing all over the Scandinavian countries until the formation of the present living tongues of Sweden and Denmark—an analysis of the Eddas, Sagas, and various chronicles and songs relating to the Northern deities and heroes, constituting the original materials from which the work has been principally composed. It is intended to illustrate the history of France and England during the middle ages, and at the same time to serve as an introduction to the modern history of Denmark, Norway, and Sweden.

AN HISTORICAL INQUIRY INTO THE PRODUCTION AND CONSUMPTION OF THE PRECIOUS METALS, from the Earliest Ages, and into the Influence of their Increase or Diminution on the Prices of Commodities. By William Jacob, Esq. F. R. S. In 8vo.

"Mr. Jacob's Historical Inquiry into the Production and Consumption of the Precious Metals is one of the most curious and important works which has lately issued from the press. The influence of the precious metals on the industry of mankind is acknowledged to be great; though, perhaps, the notions respecting the precise mode of its operation were obscure, and undoubtedly the history of its effects had never been traced with accuracy and ingenuity. Mr. Huskisson, who had maintained a friendship with Mr. Jacob for more than five-and-twenty years, first put the author on the investigation; it is one of the minor obligations which the country owes to that enlightened statesman."—Spectator.

"It was written at the suggestion of the late Mr. Huskisson, and displays the fruits of much industry and research, guided by a sound judgment, and embodying more learning than is usually brought to bear on statistical or economical subjects. We recommend the book to general attention."—Times.

THE PEOPLE'S LIBRARY.

The editors and publishers should receive the thanks of the present generation, and the gratitude of posterity, for being the first to prepare in language what deserves to be entitled not the ENCYCLOPÆDIA AMERICANA, but the PEOPLE'S LIBRARY."—N. Y. Courier and Enquirer.

Just Published, by Carey, Lea, and Blanchard, and sold in Philadelphia by E. L. Carey & A. Hart; in New-York by C. & H. Carvill; in Boston by Carter & Hendee; in Baltimore by E. Dale, & W. & J. Neal; in Washington by Thompson & Homans; in London by J. H. Nash; in Savannah by W. T. Williams; in Charleston by V. H. Berrett; in New-Orleans by W. M. Kean; in Mobile by Odiorne & Co.; and by the principal booksellers throughout the Union.

VOLUME 12,

CONTAINING ABOUT 1,500 ARTICLES,

(To be continued at intervals of three months,)

OF THE

ENCYCLOPÆDIA AMERICANA:

A

POPULAR DICTIONARY

OF

THE SCIENCES, LITERATURE, HISTORY, AND POLITICS,

BROUGHT DOWN TO THE PRESENT TIME, AND INCLUDING A COPIOUS COLLECTION OF ORIGINAL ARTICLES IN AMERICAN BIOGRAPHY:

On the basis of the Seventh Edition of the German

CONVERSATIONS-LEXICON.

EDITED BY FRANCIS LIEBER,

ASSISTED BY

EDWARD WIGGLESWORTH AND T. G. BRADFORD, ESQRS.

THIRTEEN LARGE VOLUMES, OCTAVO, PRICE TO SUBSCRIBERS, BOUND IN CLOTH, TWO DOLLARS AND A HALF EACH.

EACH VOLUME WILL CONTAIN BETWEEN 600 AND 700 PAGES.

THE WORLD-RENOWNED CONVERSATIONS-LEXICON."—Edinburgh Review.

It supersedes cumbersome Encyclopedias, and put within the reach of the poor man, a complete library, equal to about forty or fifty good-sized octavos, embracing every possible subject of interest to the number of 20,000 in all—provided a spare either from his earnings or his extravagancies, twenty cents a week, for three years, a library so contrived, as to be equally suited to the learned and the unlearned,—the mechanic—the merchant, and the professional man."—N. Y. Courier and Enquirer.

The reputation of this valuable work has augmented with each volume; and the unanimous opinion of the press, uttered from all quarters, be true, which in every instance happens to be the case, it is indeed one of the best of publications.

It should be in the possession of every intelligent man, as it is a library in itself, comprising an immense mass of lore upon almost every possible subject and in the cheapest possible form."—N. Y. Mirror.

ENCYCLOPÆDIA AMERICANA.

MORE than half of the volumes of this work are now before the public, and the reception they have met with is the best evidence that the publishers have fulfilled the promises made at its outset. They have now only to promise, for the editors and themselves, that no exertion shall be spared to render the remaining volumes equal to those already published, and thus sustain the reputation it has acquired. The subscription is large, and increasing; and in those quarters where its circulation is greatest, and where it is best known, there is a constantly increasing demand. The publishers invite the attention of those who may not already have possessed themselves of it, or may not have had an opportunity to become acquainted with its merits, to the following account of the original work, upon which it is based, and which is termed by the Edinburgh Review—

THE WORLD-RENOWNED LEIPZIG CONVERSATIONS LEXICON.

It was intended to supply a want occasioned by the character of the age, in which the sciences, arts, trades, and the various forms of knowledge and of active life, had become so much extended and diversified, that no individual engaged in business could become well acquainted with all subjects of general interest; while the wide diffusion of information rendered such knowledge essential to the character of an accomplished man. This want, no existing works were adequate to supply. Books treating of particular branches, such as gazetteers, &c. were too confined in character; while voluminous Encyclopædias were too learned, scientific, and cumbrous, being usually elaborate treatises, requiring much study or previous acquaintance with the subject discussed. The conductors of the CONVERSATION LEXICON endeavored to select from every branch of knowledge what was necessary to a well-informed mind, and to give popular views of the more abstruse branches of learning and science; that their readers might not be incommoded, and deprived of pleasure or improvement, by ignorance of facts or expressions used in books or conversation. Such a work must obviously be of great utility to every class of readers. It has been found so much so in Germany, that it is met with everywhere, among the learned, the lawyers, the military, artists, merchants, mechanics, and men of all stations. The reader may judge how well it is adapted to its object, from the circumstance, that though it now consists of twelve volumes, seven editions, comprising about ONE HUNDRED THOUSAND COPIES, have been printed in less than fifteen years. It has been translated into the Swedish, Danish and Dutch languages, and a French translation is now preparing in Paris.

In the preparation of the American edition, no expense has been spared to secure the ablest assistance, and the editors have been aided by many gentlemen of distinguished ability.

The American Biography, which is very extensive has been furnished by MR. WALSH, who has long paid particular attention to that branch of our literature, and from materials in the collection of which he has been engaged for some years. For obvious reasons, the notices of distinguished Americans will be confined to deceased individuals: the European biography contains notices of all distinguished living characters, as well as those of past times.

The articles on Zoology and the various branches of Natural Science, and those on Chemistry and Mineralogy, have been prepared expressly for this work by gentlemen distinguished in the several departments.

In relation to the Fine Arts, the work is exceedingly rich. Great attention was given to this in the German work, and the Editors have been anxious to render it, by the necessary additions, as perfect as possible.

To gentlemen of the Bar, the work will be peculiarly valuable, as in cases where legal subjects are treated, an account is given of English, French, German and American Law.

1/16/60 HBY
M D 1

